"I did a long time ago," said her mistress, grasping the back of a chair and turning her face, which had suddenly paled, to the window. "However, that will do, Mary; take Miss Mabel down to her breakfast, I will take a cup of tea here as I don't feel very well this morning."

Left to herself, Mrs. Duncan sank on an easy chair, trembling violently. What could this discovery mean? The finding of the solitaire was not so much in itself. It might have reached the position in which it had been discovered innocently enough, but that it should have come into Mortimer Capesthorne's hands, Paul's rival, or into the hands of any of his people or friends, was indeed suspicious.

As Mrs. Duncan sat confusedly wondering at the strangeness of the jackdaw's find, the remembrance of Capesthorne's threat of vengeance, of the bitterness of his words, of the fierce earnestness of purpose as evinced by his appearance and gestures, rose before her, and as she re-called each incident of the scene, she shuddered at the possibility of a crime to which the discovery might form the clue. Surely, she thought, Providence is working in this matter. By what a chain of apparently trivial accidents the only evidence or trace of her lost husband in all these long years had been obtained—and obtained, too, by his own child, who was entirely ignorant of the momentousness of her unwitting discovery. The more Mrs. Duncan thought the more she felt assured that at last she possessed a clue to her husband's fate, and the determination formed itself in her heart that, come what might, she would unravel it if it took her a lifetime.

The cup of tea which she had taken calmed her, and she soon decided on her present course of action at any rate. She would go over at once to Glyn Ogwen and make nquiries through the Mosscrops, whom she knew she could trust, and the result should determine her future movements. She was possessed of much quiet energy, and lost no time in starting on her quest. The horses were ordered out, a few directions given in case she should not return that night, the 10 o'clock train from North Thorne to Oswestry caught, and early in the afternoon Mrs. Duncan was sitting talking to Mr. and Mrs. Mosscrop in their cottage at Glyn Ogwen. She did not explain to them the real motive of her visit, but let them understand rather that it had a good deal to do with her former friendship with Mr. Capesthorne. Excuses from Mr. Duncan, however simple, were readily accepted by the Mosscrops, and the old man felt quite proud of the escort duty which he was called upon to perform in conducting her to Nant Gwern.

Owen Williams, whom they found at work at the entrance gate, seemed reluctant to allow another visitor through the house, and especially a grown-up one, but John Mosscrop's friendly influence and the lady's winning manner overcame his opposition, and he left his work and proceeded with them to the house, where he put Mrs. Duncan in charge of his wife, telling her to show the lady over the place. It was a dull, dark evening, the clouds gathering in the west were threatening, the atmosphere was still and oppressive, and the narrow valley, with its fringe of sombre firs, looked more gloomy than usual. Following her guide, who delivered a rambling explanation in broken Welsh and English, from room to room, from gallery to gallery, smelling the dead, damp smell of the hangings and furniture, hearing the numerous echoes of their feet and voices, and of the doors which they opened and shut, and feeling the depressing influence of the place keenly, the lines of Hood's weird poem recurred to her memory, and she kept on repeating them to herself almost unconsciously—

O'er all there hung the shadow of a fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
Which said as plain as whisper in the ear,
"This place is haunted."

At length they reached the room where the jackdaw had found the solitaire, and Mrs. Duncan's heart beat fast as she recognized it—which she at once did from Mabel's description.

"What a strange room, and how untidy," she exclaimed, as she glanced inquiringly round.

"Yes; master used it as his library when he was here, which wasn't often," replied Mrs. Williams, speaking in her queer, broken dialect.

"Well, but why should it be left in this state?"

"It's in this way, you see ma'am," said the old woman; "master had some workmen in the day he went away, and when they'd finished, he was in such a hurry to catch his train, that he just took and locked the door, and put the key in his pocket, leaving word that no one was to go in at all, as he would not have anything disturbed; but the rain was getting in last week through the roof so badly that Mr. Morgan, the agent, said we must break the lock and have things put right. The men finished the other day and we are having a new lock and key made at Oswestry, which should be here tomorrow, when we'll lock it up again, I suppose."

"Is it long since Mr. Capesthorne went away?" Mrs. Duncan asked quietly, not wishing to show how deeply she was excited.

"Just about five years since come September, ma'am. We never hear anything of him, but Mr. Morgan does at times, I believe.

"I feel rather tired," said Mrs. Duncan, moving towards the windows looking down into the rushing torrent of the Alwyn; "would you get me a glass of water, Mrs. Williams, while I rest here a little."

Certainly, m'am, replied the old woman, moving away; and soon her footsteps could be heard along the sounding passages, and Mrs. Duncan found herself alone. A feeling of fear took possession of her for a moment. The room was so eerie looking in the half light, a deathly smell seemed to pervade it, and the noises made by the retreating Welshwoman sounded so hollow and mysterious, that she almost repented she had let her go. What could those dark oak panels and shadowy bookshelves tell if they could but speak. Those three old portraits of Capesthornes of the past looking down from their dusty frames, naturally dark of visage, darker now with age. What murderous or unhallowed deed had they been witness to.

That her husband had met his fate in that gloomy old mansion, perhaps in that very room, Mrs. Duncan was convinced; the very walls seemed to tell her of it, the air whispered it, and again the lines came to her, only more forcibly—

O'er all there hung the shadow of a fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit daunted.

How to Paint on Velvet.

The most artistic manner of treatment is probably that where the design is first painted thinly with oils in subdued colors upon the velvet, and then the requisite effect of light and brilliancy gained by means of metallic or lustra paints. Choose the material with a short, close pile, and select a simple design, writes Maude Haywood in her art department in The Ladies' Home Journal. Birds, butterflies, flowers, fruit and scroll-patterns are suitable subjects; but nothing involving minute detail or delicacy of outline should be attempted. Dark backgrounds are the most effective and easiest to manage. The principal difficulty lies in the liability of the oil to spread beyond the tints, forming a greasy halo. To obviate this some recommend squeezing the colors upon blotting-paper to absorb the oil; others, for the same reason, advise the rubbing of magnesia on the back of the velvet. With care, neither are necessary, but the paints, instead, should be slightly thinned with fresh spirits of turpentine. Avoid matting the pile of the fabric, and let the color of the material show through the tints in the shadows. Paint rather flatly in soft tones, and remember that the least harshness is particularly fatal. Next outline the design in metallic gold, boldly but carefully, and touch it up with various-colored bronzes, employing soft green shades for the high lights and edges of the leaves, gold for stamens, thorns and, perhaps, tendrils, and whatever tints approach nearest to the colors of nature to enhance the brilliancy of flower or fruit.

Unable to Give a Plain Answer.

Martin van Buren, the American statesman was accused of an inability to give a plain answer to a plain question. One day, when he was on board a steamer, the passengers were talking of this pecularity, and one of them observed, "I'll wager champagne for the company that one of us shall go down and ask Mr. Van Buren the simplest question that can be thought of, and he will evade a direct answer. Yes! and I'll give you leave, too, to tell him why the question is asked, and that there is a bet depending on his reply!" This seemed fair enough, certainly; for to be forewarned was to be forearmed. One of the party was deputed to go and try the experiment. He found Mr. Van Buren, whom he knew well, in the saloon, and said to him, "Mr. Van Buren, some gentlemen on the upper deck have been accusing you of non-committalism, and have just laid a wager that you wouldn't give a plain answer to the simplest question; and they have deputed to me to test the fact. Now, Mr. Van Buren, let me ask you, where does the sun rise?" Mr. Van Buren's brow contracted; he hesitated a moment and then replied, "The terms 'east' and 'west,' Mr.——, are conventional, but I——" "That'll do!" interrupted the interrogator: "we've lost the bet."

BRAZIL ALL RIGHT.

Further Advices Direct from Brazil Denying the Alarming Reports of a Revolution.

Local Conflicts in One Province Not Caused by Opposition to the Republic.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Senor Mendonca, the British minister here, has received the following by cablegram from the Brazilian minister of foreign relations:

Affirm that complete tranquillity reigns in all of the states except Rio Grande, where conflicts provoked by questions pertaining to local politics occurred, with which, in virtue of the constitution, the federal government could not interfere. Deny rumors of secession; the idea is condemned by all Brazilians. Affirm that no state thinks of seceding; deny that members of the dissolved congress are in foreign legations as refugees. Nearly all the members of congress returned to their states. Those who remain here go about the city at liberty. Thus far the government has taken no violent measures. A day will be set for the next election, and congress convened to meet immediately after. Gen. Deodoro will review the troops now at the anniversary of the proclamation of the republic.

As confirmatory evidence of the truth of the statement that the troubles in Rio Grande are purely internal and have no bearing on national affairs, Minister Mendonca says that he has discovered that the junta in that state is composed of four persons, instead of three, as at first reported. It was at first supposed Casal Ribeiro was one member, while it appears that two persons were referred to, Senhor Cassal and Senhor Ribeiro. Both of these men are prominent leaders in the state, so that the junta stands three republicans to one liberal. The latter, Gen. Rosario, however, is not believed to cherish any monarchical principles.

The minister has also received private information that the length to which the reported revolutionary movement in the state of Para went was the adoption by the state assembly of a set of resolutions condemning the action of the president and approving the course pursued by congress. He also says, ironically, that instead of feeling anxiety for the welfare of the Brazilian republic, he is inclined to sympathize with the unfortunate owners of Brazilian Bonds in England, whose holdings appear to be declining as a result of the work of unscrupulous speculators.

CONFLICTING REPORTS.

LONDON, Nov. 17.—News from Brazil continues of the most conflicting character—official dispatches from Rio Janeiro asserting with unequivocal positiveness that the country is tranquil, while telegrams from Buenos Ayres and Santiago report Brazil torn with dissensions and secession. It is not known how such dispatches reach Buenos Ayres and Chili.

The latest official advice from Brazil states that the trouble in Rio Grande do Sul is purely local and that the government of that state is now in the hands of a provisional junta. It is inferred from this that the authorities at Rio regard the junta in sympathy with the central government, but this theory is contradicted by dispatches from Santiago to the Times. These declare that the provisional junta has taken absolute control and asserts that it has an army of 30,000 men armed with rifles.

A YOUTHFUL REPUBLIC.

RIO JANEIRO, Nov. 17.—The second anniversary of the republic of Brazil was observed to-day. A military review and fetes were held in honor of the occasion. The day passed quietly, the public taking scant interest in the celebration. The situation in San Paulo is daily becoming more and more grave.

Day Wins His Libel Suit.

FAIRMONT, Minn., Special Telegram, Nov. 17.—The newspaper libel case of Senator Frank A. Day, editor of the Sentinel, against H. M. Blaisdell, of the Fairmont News, was concluded to-day. The jury returned a verdict of $500 in favor of the plaintiff. The action was brought before the last general election to recover $5,000 on account of alleged libelous articles against the plaintiff's official honesty and integrity. Among other charges against plaintiff was that he would promise to vote for Davis for senator and then sell his vote to Merriam. The defendant in court denied that he had any intention of charging Day with corruption or dishonesty. Errie Olson was one of the witnesses for the defense. The jury was out about four hours.

Three Saloonists Indicted.

WABASHA, Minn., Special, Nov. 17.—The grand jury, which has been in session for a week past, completed its work and was discharged by Judge Start to-day. Five indictments were found, as follows: William Wood of Lake City, for selling liquor on Sunday; Peter Redding of the same place, two counts, selling to a minor and keeping his saloon open Sundays; Alfred Dary, an old offender, was also indicted on two counts—Plainview, where Dary lives, is a prohibition town, but it is alleged that he has openly sold original packages and intoxicants of all kinds. A bitter war is being waged against the liquor business in both Plainview and Lake City.

Would Suit the Chinch Bugs.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special, Nov. 17.—If we have a heavy fall of snow this winter the chances are good, according to the farmers, for the development and growth of an extra large crop of chinch bugs next year. These farmers say that while the bugs have not multiplied in localities where they have appeared in sufficient numbers to do any damage this season, there are still a good many more than there were at this time last year.

Married Washington Men.

RED WING, Minn., Special, Nov. 17.—Announcement has been received here of the marriage at Chicago of Miss Carrie F. Anderson of this city to W. Asher Parker of Seattle, Wash.

HASTINGS, Minn., Special, Nov. 17.—Miss Mary E. Bean of Hampton and John G. Davies of Puyallup, Wash., were recently married at the latter place.

South Dakota Appointments.

PIERRE, S. D., Nov. 17.—Gov. Mellette today appointed Andrew Van Camp county judge of Hyde county, vice J. T. Haigh, removed for crime. He also appointed J. J. Batterton county judge of Roberts county, vice T. A. Countryman, resigned.

Cremated Himself.

WILKESBARRE, Pa., Nov. 17.—William Ruddy, aged twenty-six years, committed suicide in a most sensational manner at his home in this city to-day. It is alleged that Ruddy came here and found that his mother drank to excess, and this so troubled him that he resolved to make way with himself. He poured coal oil over himself and by thrusting his hand into the fire, became enveloped in flames. He then seized a sharp knife and stabbed himself over the heart inflicting a wound that would in itself have resulted fatally. He was horribly burned, his flesh hanging in shreds, and in a short time death freed him from his excruciating suffering.

Seamen Desert in Droves.

HALIFAX, N. S., Special.—The British North American and West India squadron, composed of the flagship Bellerophon, Emerald, Pelican and Tourmaline, and commanded by Admiral Sir George Watson, sailed for winter quarters at Bermuda. Just previous to the sailing of the fleet a large number of desertions occurred.

Money for Evicted Tenants.

DUBLIN, Special.—A meeting of the National Federation was held to-day at Tullamore at which the question of providing means for the relief of evicted tenants was discussed in all its bearings. It was finally resolved to fix the contributions to the fund for this purpose at 3 pence in the pound on the parish valuations.

Catarrh

Is a constitutional and not a local disease, and therefore it cannot be cured by local applications. It requires a constitutional remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, working through the blood, effects a permanent cure of catarrh by eradicating the impurity which causes and promotes the disease. Thousands of people testify to the success of Hood's Sarsaparilla as a remedy for catarrh when other preparations had failed. Hood's Sarsaparilla also builds up the whole system, and makes you feel renewed in health and strength. All who suffer from catarrh or debility should certainly try Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Local Applications Failed—Hood's Sarsaparilla Did Him Good.

"I have been troubled for the past few years with catarrh, and have never received the least benefit that I can see from the many so-called catarrh cures. Of late I have been taking and can honestly say that I feel much better. My general health is certainly improved. I know Hood's Sarsaparilla to be a good medicine." H. A. GEORGE, Athol, Mass.

WEDDED TO BACCHUS.

A Vow That He Would Never Draw Another Sober Breath.

Unshorn, unshaven, the wreck of a once good-looking man was awakened from his nap on a bench in Battery Park by a gray-coated policeman. From his pocket had fallen a diary on the first page of which was written what follows:

"My name is—— ——. I am from Sedalia, Mo., and came to this city with some friends I knew in better days. They are not here now. Five years ago I was prosperous, but a little given to strong drink, or what temperance apostles are pleased to denominate doubledistilled damnation. I drank in secret at that time, and whenever I got drunk, locked myself in my room and had a personal inserted in the papers to the effect that I was sick.

"About three years ago I fell in love for the first time. Other girls had interested me, but nothing more. I celebrated the discovery by a rip-roaring drunk. My suit did not prosper as I would have liked, and my means were dwindling away, so I determined to know my fate.

"I was refused, and in the presence of the woman I loved I swore never to breathe a sober breath. Several times I have come near breaking my oath, owing to financial reasons, but have managed somehow always to make ends meet.

"I go on my way, and when my corpse is rattled over the stones, as the poets have it, it will be nothing but a mixture of beer and bad whiskey.

Caves in Tasmania.

Some fine caves have lately been discovered near Southport, Tasmania. At the meeting of the Royal Society of Tasmania in June, an account of them was given by Mr. Morton, who had visited them. They are situated about four miles from Ida Bay, and a fairly good road leads to them. The entrance is through a limestone formation. A strong stream flows along the floor of the chambers. The first chamber reached by Mr. Morton and those who accompanied him showed some fine stalactities, and along the floor some fine stalagmites were seen. On the lights carried by the party being extinguished, the ceilings and sides of the caves seemed studded with diamonds, an effect due to millions of glow-worms hanging to the sides of the walls and from the ceilings. Further on several chambers were explored, each revealing grander sights. The time at disposal being limited, the party had to return after traversing a distance of about three-quarters of a mile, but from what was observed the caves evidently extended a distance of three or four miles. The only living creatures seen were the glow-worms. These caves, under proper supervision, should become, Mr. Morton thinks, one of the great attractions of the South of Tasmania.

Rio Janiero's principal street is only 30 feet wide, only half a mile long, and no carriages are allowed to enter it.

GIVE THANKS.

Thursday, Nov. 26, Appointed by the President for This Purpose.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14.—President Harrison to-day issued the following proclamation:

It is a very glad incident of the marvelous prosperity which has crowned the year now drawing to a close that its helpful and reassuring touch has been felt by all our people. It has been as wide as our country, and so special that every home has felt its comforting influence. It is too great to be the work of man's power, and too particular to be the device of his mind. To God, the beneficent and all wise, who makes the labors of men to be fruitful, redeems their losses by his grace, and the measure of whose giving is as much beyond the thought of man as it is beyond his deserts, the praise and gratitude of the people of this favored nation are justly due.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States of America, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 26th day of November, present, to be a day of joyful thanksgiving to God for the bounties of his providence, for the peace in which we are permitted to enjoy them, and for the preservation of those institutions of civil and religious liberty which he gave our fathers the wisdom to devise and establish, and us the courage of preserve. Among the appropriate observances of the day are rest from toil, worship in the public congregations, the renewal of family ties, about our American firesides, and thoughtfulness towards those who suffer lack of the body or of the spirits.

Easy, or Impossible.

A remark imputed to Victor Hugo in reply to a young man, who asked him if it was difficult to write poetry, is both witty and true, but it is more witty than true.

"My dear sir," the poet is said to have replied, "it is either easy or impossible!"

But it is not always easy for true poets to write poetry. Homer nodded occasionally, and other great poets have put forth most prosy poetry.

FOUND DEAD IN BED

Sudden Death of a Prominent Unitarian Minister From Apoplexy at a Hotel in Eau Claire.

He Is Found Dead in His Room, the Body Being Bruised and Showing Signs of Fearful Convulsions.

Eau Claire, Wis., Special Telegram, Nov. 24.—Early this morning Rev. Henry D. Maxson, pastor of the Unitarian church of this city, was found dead in his room at the Galloway house. His head was hanging out of bed and showed several contusions, which, with other marks, indicated that death had been preceded by severe convulsions. Death was declared to have been caused by apoplexy.

Rev. Mr. Maxson was about thirty-nine years of age. He was born near Ithaca, N. Y., and his parents and a brother are still living there. He graduated with high honors from Amherst college. He came to Wisconsin about twelve years ago. He taught in Milton college, in the Markham academy at Milwaukee and in the Whitewater normal school, and subsequently entering the Unitarian ministry had been in charge of the Menomonie and Eau Claire churches for about three years. He was especially well known and esteemed among the educators of Wisconsin.

A year or two ago while Mr. Maxson was in the East he experienced an attack which indicated impending cerebral hemorrhage. It occurred during the night, but he knew nothing of it until next morning, when glancing in a mirror he found that his face was bruised and cut presumably during a violent convulsion. Mr. Maxson's wife and little girl were at Menominie. Word was sent to Mrs. Maxson by telephone but she was utterly prostrated by grief and it was thought best that she should not come to Eau Claire. The body was taken to the home of the deceased at Menominie this afternoon.

HIS DEATH WIDELY ANNOUNCED.

Menomenee, Wis., Special Telegram, Nov. 24.—The remains of Rev. Henry Doty Maxson, the gifted young pastor of the Unitarian churches of this city and Eau Claire, arrived this afternoon accompanied by prominent citizens of Eau Claire. Mr. Maxson was found dead in his room at the hotel in Eau Claire, where he preached last night as usual. Mr. Maxson leaves a wife and daughter. He was greatly beloved and respected, and had a great ambition for the future. His death was a terrible shock to people. Hundreds of the most prominent people in the town met the body at the train.

THE MADISON TRIAL.

All the Testimony in the Treasury Cases in—Result of Complicated Legislation.

Madison, Wis., Nov. 24.—At last the testimony in the treasury cases is all in and the defendants rest for the time being.

This morning the ex-attorney general again took the stand and testified on the point so strongly argued by the attorneys for the state, that trust funds could have been profitably invested in United States bonds. He said that the constitution of the state and the statutes of the state, as he understood them, practically prevented the loaning of money in government bonds. He reasoned that the law provided that the trust funds must remain intact; in other words the premium could not have been used to pay a loss that might have resulted in a falling off of the premiums of the bonds. The law also proved that the interest on trust funds should be used for a certain purpose only and therefore could not have been used for the paying of a fall in price of the premium of government bonds.

The assembly and senate journal from 1884 to 1889 were then introduced to show the history of legislation and attempted legislation on the interest matter. They showed that the commissioners of public lands, whose duty it is to loan trust funds, urged upon the legislatures continually to reduce the minimum rate of interest in order to facilitate loans, and bills were introduced to that effect, but the legislators were loth to pass them. This goes to show that there was no conspiracy between the commissioners to prevent the loaning of trust funds, as charged in the complaint.

Ex-Treasurer McFetridge was next placed on the stand and he testified to the fact that when he was treasurer all the diligence possible was used to secure the investment of trust funds, but that in many instances the commissioners were handicapped by the old legislature, which fixed the rate of interest at 7 per cent. Ex-Treasurer Kuehn was again called to the stand, and he testified that the vaults in the treasury department did not have a time lock and were unsafe for that reason. This ended the taking of testimony and Mr. Bashford opened the argument for the defense.

Still Another Clue.

Milwaukee, Wis., Nov. 24.—The latest possible clue to the train robbers who recently held up the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul passenger train near Western Union Junction is furnished by the Milwaukee police. The day before the robbery, two strangers purchased at a Milwaukee gun store a quantity of dynamite, together with fuse and caps. As dynamite was used in blowing open the express car, the local authorities are satisfied that the two strangers are the train robbers. A local detective, with an employe of the gun store, went to Western Union Junction yesterday to look at the farm hand employed by Farmer Worthington, who has been under suspicion since it was discovered that he wore the overshoes the peculiar imprint of which was in the snow and was discovered on the morning of the robbery, but failed to identify him.

A Great Financial Scheme.

Paris, Nov. 24.—Mr. Seligman, who was sent to Europe as the representative of the United States treasury department, with a view to bringing about the holding of an international conference to secure the establishment of a common ratio of value between gold and silver, has been in this city to secure the co-operation of France. Rouvier, the minister of finance, expressed his sympathy with the proposal, but stated that he was not willing to take the initiative in the matter. He expressed the hope that England and Germany might be induced to co-operate with France to bring about a conference to effect the desired end.

A REVOLUTION IN RIO.

Citizens of Brazil Rise in Their Wrath and at One Blow Depose Fonseca.

London, Nov. 24.—Intelligence has been received here that a revolution broke out in Rio de Janeiro to-day. The object is to overthrow Da Fonseca.

A later dispatch says that Da Fonseca has resigned in favor of Floriano Peixotte.

Dispatches from Rio de Janeiro this afternoon bring the intelligence that the opposition to Dictator Fonseca gathered sufficient force to break through the barrier erected by the government to hold it in check and to make itself master of the situation. No details have yet been received as to the precise methods adopted.

All that is known is that the uprising was so formidable that Fonseca considered it impossible longer to maintain his ascendancy, and has surrendered his authority. In retiring, or resigning as he called it, he declared that he did so in favor of Floriano Peixotte, the vice president or vice chief of the provisional government of which Fonseca was the head. Whether the opposition will be content to allow Peixotte, about whom little is known here, to assume the leadership of state is not known. It is not believed that he will be permitted to act as chief executive, even temporarily, unless he is in sympathy with the ideas and principles of the leaders of

TO-DAY'S REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT.

Rio de Janeiro is in a state of great excitement, but no reports have come as yet indicating mob law or serious disorder. The uprising, however, had the effect of putting a stop for the time being to all kinds of business. The exchanges are closed and everybody is so interested in watching political developments that no thought is given to commercial pursuits or business elements.

The news that Fonseca had resigned was everywhere received with enthusiastic cheers and exclamations of satisfaction. The provinces have not yet been heard from, but it is believed from the advices hitherto received in regard to the growing opposition throughout the country to Fonseca's supremacy that the news of his downfall will everywhere be received with the same satisfaction as at the capital.

The revolution at Rio de Janeiro only broke out this morning and its work was quickly accomplished.

Eau Claire, Wis., Special, Nov. 24.—The figures showing the work of the saw mills in this city and vicinity during the season of 1891 are tabulated below, all being complete as furnished by the companies except those of Knapp, Stout & Co. which are reliably estimated:

EAU CLAIRE, PORTERVILLE, BADGER MILLS AND MERIDIAN.

Grand totals	308,563,681	78,765,205	161,676,250

The same mills cut in 1890 349,949,680 feet of lumber. The reduction this year of 40,000,000 or more is due to the lack of logs. It is surprising that the reduction is not greater than it is. The Badger State Lumber company, for example, shut down early in July on account of the scarcity of logs. The picket cut is not included in the table. The aggregate of pickets turned out by all the mills was 1,342,505.

MIDGLEY SUBPENAED.

The Omaha Grand Jury After the Missouri Pacific With a Sharp Stick.

Chicago, Nov. 24.—United States Marshal Hitchcock to-day received subpenas from the United States district court at Omaha for J. W. Midgley, J. N. Faithorn, G. L. Carman and D. C. Bridges to appear before the federal grand jury at Omaha Nov. 30. Only two of these men are now stationed in Chicago—Chairman Midgley, of the Western Freight association, and Supt. Carman, of the Western Railway Weighing association.

Mr. Midgley is directed by the court to bring among other things the records of the weights of stone shipped by Hugh Murphy from Lyons, Colo., to Omaha and South Omaha, and all reports, records of billing, documents and papers pertaining to shipments from South Omaha and Nebraska City, and to produce all the figures of the tariffs then in effect covering the shipments from those points on the Missouri Pacific road from Jan. 1, 1890, to the 16th inst. It would appear that the Omaha grand jury is after the Missouri Pacific with a sharp stick. It is said that the charges preferred against that road are sweeping in their nature.

Edwin C. Swift, Lewis F. Swift, Augustus F. Swift and Edwin Hadwell, comprising the firm of Swift & Co., the packers who were indicted by the federal grand jury, gave bail to-day before Judge Blodgett. Albert H. Veeder, attorney for the Swifts, became surety for the amount of the bail, which was $2,500 in each case.

A Hotel Closed Up.

Missoula, Mont., Nov. 24.—Kennedy & Mitchell, proprietors of the Missoula hotel were closed up Saturday by the sheriff. Their liabilities will approximate $70,000. Nov. 17 three mortgages for $40,000 each were filed against the property within a few minutes of each other, all in favor of W. C. Murphy. To-day the First National bank, a creditor of Kennedy & Mitchell to the amount of $15,000, attached the property. The mortgages then became public.

World's Fair Fund Languishes.

Sauk Rapids, Minn., Special, Nov. 24.—A careful investigation shows that there is no disposition shown in Benton county to raise the $240 apportioned to the county by the world's fair commissioners. WANTED--A BURGLAR.

THE STRANGE STORY OF A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.

BY J. WEBSTER BAYNES.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Paul Duncan was missing. No cause could be assigned for his absence nor clue discovered as to his whereabouts. Paul Duncan had incurred the enmity of one Mortimer Capesthorne, it grew from the fact that Duncan nor his father would consent to re-sell Elmsfold the home of the Duncans, but which formerly had belonged to the Capesthornes. This feeling was intensified when Mortimer and Paul became rivals for the hand of Ellen Corbielle and Paul succeeded. Mortimer cursed Ellen and uttered some dire threats saying that she and Paul would yet feel his power in a way they little dreamt of. Shortly afterwards he sold his property and left the place. Ellen's daughter, Mabel, had gone to visit the mother of her maid, one Mrs. Mosscrop who had formerly been Paul Duncan's nurse. She and Mary spent the greater part of the day roaming about a curious old mansion, the owner of which had gone abroad and left orders that it should not be shown to visitors, but Mabel was a privileged character and Williams the caretaker had been induced to let the girls inspect it. Mabel and Mary had been investigating one of the rooms when they were startled by a jack-daw which had flown into the room and picked up an object which it discovered on the hearth and proceeded to inspect. It proved to be a cuff-button with a turquoise setting. Mabel put it in her pocket intending to give it to Mrs. Williams but she forgot it and carried it home with her. Her mother was greatly agitated when she showed it to her, it having been a present from herself to Paul and he had worn it on the day of his disappearance. She made a trip to Glynn Ogwen and investigated the old mansion called Nant Gwern which she discovered belonged to Mortimer Capesthorne. She was convinced that Paul Duncan had met his fate in that old mansion.

CHAPTER V.

AT FAULT.

Mrs. Duncan was on the point of screaming, so unnerved had she become. But by a sudden effort of will she recovered and averting her gaze from the grim portraits of the ancestral Capesthornes, she advanced to the large open fireplace and began to turn over the ashes in the grate, regardless of the ruin of her small delicate gloves. The search, however, seemed fruitless, a few charred papers and bits of wood were all she could find. Scarcely had she satisfied herself that nothing was to be obtained in that direction, when the sound of footsteps told of the return of Mrs. Williams. Hastily putting the partly burnt papers into her reticule, she rose from her knees and resumed her place by the window, from which apparently she had not moved. She had sent for the water as an excuse to examine the ashes amongst which the solitaire had been found, yet it was very acceptable when it came, for her lips and throat were dry and parched; and the old woman noticing her extreme pallor, advised her to come down to her little rooms at the back and have a cup of tea, or to get out into the open air, as the old house, and that room in particular, never were cheery at the best of times; and Mrs. Duncan, feeling that for the present she could do nothing more, gladly assented, and in a few moments they found themselves again at the entrance.

Refusing the proffered tea, and presenting the old couple, much to their amazement, with a sovereign, on the strength of which she was invited to come as often as she liked, she turned away from the sombre-looking mansion with the conviction strong upon her that in it lay the secret which she would give so much to possess. What she had learned was not much, but still quite sufficient to confirm her in her suspicion, that on the head of Mortimer Capesthorne alone could be laid the guilt attached to the disappearance of her husband. Nant Gwern had been purchased some years or so after her marriage with Paul Duncan. All business transactions connected with it had been carried out in London, and Glyn Ogwen and its people knew nothing of the new comer, not even his name, until some time afterwards, when he appeared upon the scene to claim his own. Then he was identified as a gentleman who some years before, had stayed for a time at the Pont Ogwen Arms, a pretty fishing inn further up the Glyn. He had not fished much, but spent most of his time wandering about the neighboring valleys, and in solitary walks over the surrounding hills. Nant Gwern seemed to have some peculiar fascination for him, and he spent days in and near it. After he became possessed of it, he resided for a few months at the place, mostly alone, but occasionally visited by gentlemen from London, who came for the fishing and shooting. When, with hardly a word of warning to any one, he closed the hall and left for the continent, no one much regretted it, excepting perhaps the servants, who were dismissed. He had not been liked, but he paid good wages, a matter of great importance the world over. Nant Gwern had only seen its proprietor once again, and that for a brief period. Those left in charge received a message saying that he was coming down for a week or two, that only two rooms were to be prepared for him and close upon the heels of his message he came himself. He stayed about a week and then left as suddenly as he had come, since which time Glyn Ogwen had neither seen nor heard of him. The time of his last visit tallied with the date of Paul Duncan's disappearance; but that, of course, might be a coincidence merely.

This was the sum total of what Mrs. Duncan had learned, but little as it was it satisfied her that she was upon the right track. On the way back, to the village, old John Mosscrop talked in a rambling way about the Glyn and its beauties, and although his companion did not pay much heed to what he was saying, being too much occupied with her own thoughts, his praise of the place and climate formed an excuse for the mentioning of a plan which she had been developing as they walked. She was so delighted with the scenery and the place, she told her guide, that if they could only find a comfortable accommodation in the neighborhood, she would bring Mabel for a time, as a change would do her good, and she herself would like to spend a week or two in the quiet valley. When the idea was communicated to Mrs. Mosscrop she was delighted with it, and immediately suggested Mr. Hughes, of the Glyn Farm, as the place of all others for Mrs. Duncan and Mabel to stay; and Mrs. Duncan being not only willing, but anxious to have the business settled, the old woman put on her bonnet and piloted her visitor to Mr. Hughes, where matters were soon arranged for a short stay, and two days later saw Mabel, her mother, and Mary Mosscrop installed in cheerful rooms at the farm, their windows overlooking the crystal Ogwen, and taking in the panoramic view of the winding valley, bounded on the north by the blue Berwyn mountains, which rose in the far distance in cloud like ranges.

To Mabel the change was a source of vast enjoyment. She renewed her acquaintance with little Annie and the jackdaw, and, with Mary to guard her, spent almost all her time out of doors. Mrs. Duncan, however, appeared to be irresistibly drawn to Nant Gwern, and, under the excuse of sketching, spent hours in wandering about the old house and grounds. She had carefully examined the fragments of the charred paper which she had found in the ashes on her first visit, but she had gleamed no information of value from them. A bill from a well-known London safe-making firm for a safe, the fragment of a dinner invitation with the name and address destroyed, and a few scraps with wording on, of which no sense could be made, was all, and these availed her nothing. Nor did she learn more from her repeated visits to the house, of which, sketch book in hand, she soon, by judicious management, had a free run. Not a vestige of further evidence could she obtain. The old people had evidently told her all they knew. They themselves were not living in the house when last Mr. Capesthorne had visited it, and, consequently, they could not give much information as to his movements and doings. The few servants who were there at the time had been dismissed, and Williams and his wife put in as caretakers by the agent at Oswestry. The servants had come from London, and when the hall was finally closed they had returned and been swallowed up in the great whirlpool of humanity, and Glyn Ogwen knew them no more. After ten days' watchfulness and inquiry, Mrs. Duncan wearily confessed to herself that she had made no advance whatever, and at length she determined upon the bold course of seeking an interview with Mortimer Capesthorne himself, and with this end in view she drove over to Oswestry to see his agent and obtain his address. She found Mr. Morgan in a queer little office in a queer little court off the market place. He was a red-haired, stiffly built, rubicund-looking man of medium height, with sharp, twinkling, grey eyes which looked too keen for the rest of his face. He received his visitor very courteously, passed her his own easy chair, and declared effusively what a pleasure it would be to him to render her any assistance in his power, before she had even stated the reason of her visit, for Mr. Morgan prided himself upon being a lady's man, and he saw at once that his caller was not only a lady, but a good-looking lady. When he heard, however, the nature of her errand, he looked a little puzzled. He was sorry, but he really could not give her Mr. Capesthorne's address. He had not heard from him for nearly a year. He was traveling somewhere, but he could not say where. He might be in Jericho, or Jamaica, or Japan, for anything he knew; and Mr. Morgan smiled pleasantly at the readiness of his own alliteration. The last communication he had from him was dated at Smyrna, and where he might be now it would be impossible to guess. Of course he might hear from him any day—to-morrow, perhaps. He was an eccentric man, very, was Mr. Capesthorne—more especially of late years. Could, ah, Mrs.—he had not caught the name—could she state the nature of her business, and then, perhaps he might be able to do something for her. Mrs. Duncan, taking no notice of his obvious attempt to learn her name, said that she could only communicate with Mr. Capesthorne himself direct; could Mr. Morgan give her the address of his London bankers; as they perhaps might be in more constant communication with him? and, also, could Mr. Morgan give her the date of his last visit to Nant Gwern, and the day upon which he left? Of the London bankers certainly; they were Messrs. Oldboy, Imrie, and Co., Lombard street; but he doubted if they would know much more than he did. Mr. Capesthorne had money invested abroad, and could draw upon it without referring to London. As to the dates of his last visit to, and departure from, Nant Gwern, he could not give her the former exactly; the latter he might do, but she must excuse him for saying that it was not just professional, not what you might call business, for him to discuss a client's going and coming with a complete stranger. To this Mrs. Duncan replied that Mr. Capesthorne had been an acquaintance of her family's and her husband's, and that her business was entirely of a family and private nature; and as to the dates, she had no doubt she could obtain them elsewhere.

"By no means, madam," cried Mr. Morgan, rising impressively and ringing the bell, "I've not a doubt but that your reasons are perfectly justifiable; but, you see, we professional gentlemen, professional gentleman, madam, cannot be too careful, too careful," and he repeated himself with emphasis and a look which was meant to be very impressive, but which did not so affect his auditor.

In answer to his ring a clerk appeared, who by instructions produced the accounts belonging to the Nant Gwern property.

"Well, now, madam, as to the dates you require," said Mr. Morgan, as he ran his finger over various items, "I find here that on the 21st September, 187—, paid, by instructions of Mr. Capesthorne, an account for bricklayers and plasterers' work details not necessary, done at Nant Gwern the day previous. Now, from this, Mr. Capesthorne must have left on the 20th for he called here in the evening and called on the following morning. He was in a hurry to catch the London mail, I remember that well, and I had to go with him to the station to receive his instructions as to the closing of the old hall. Yes, the 20th, that is the date upon which he left Nant Gwern, you can rely upon that, madam."

When the agent finished speaking, Mrs Duncan sat for a moment or two almost oblivious of his presence, then she rose in a half dreamy, half unconscious sort of a way, repeating to herself his last words, "The 20th, that is the date," as though, and doubtless it was a fact, it had burnt upon her memory. The last news she had received of or from Paul was on the 19th of that, to her, fatal month.

"Thank you, Mr. Morgan," she said, as she passed through his office door, which he held gallantly open for her to pass. "The 20th of September," and she walked out into the clear autumn sunlight, and across the wide market square, utterly oblivious of Mr. Morgan, of his position and reputation, and of the obsequious bow he gave her in sight of all the street, and the watchful people in it, and which bow he had prepared for as a climax to an incident, which he described to himself as he returned to his desk as "entertaining an angel unawares." Mrs. Duncan had other thoughts in her mind than that of Mr. Morgan and his overpowering personality. "The 20th of September. That was the day after her husband disappeared." The train to Glyn Ogwen was late, it seemed as though it would never come, but in the usual course of events she arrived at the Glyn farm only to leave again in time for the London express, which passed through Oswestry about midnight. To interview Mr. Capesthorne's bankers was her first and controlling idea; but when she learned from them that they had had no word from him for over three months, and that he then stated in his letter, addressed from Algiers, that he proposed proceeding to the West Indies, and thence to the Pacific, she gave up all notion of finding him, and turned in desperation to her old lawyers. They had tried for years to find the missing Paul Duncan, but even though the business was a paying one they had got more than sick of it, and marvelled with a kind of contemptuous pity at Mrs. Duncan and her persistent paying powers; all that they could advise her was to apply to the same Scotland Yard detective who had worked the case before, and this she did, with the result that after six weeks at Glyn Ogwen he reported less news than she herself had picked up in as many days. There was no denying the fact, so far as Mr. Morgan, of Oswestry, and the London lawyers detectives went, the covers in fox-hunting phraseology had been "drawn blank;" but Mrs. Duncan was not to be baffled easily, and after ripe consideration and weighing well the advice of Messrs. Slowcome and Waithy, her solicitors, she determined to act on her own account, feeling sure, as she did, that the secret she would give her life to unravel was one which was not to be touched or unearthed by red tape officialism.

CHAPTER VI.

WANTED A BURGLAR.

The following advertisement appeared in a well-known London daily, January 5, 187—

WANTED, an experienced Burglar. None but first-class cracksmen need apply. Secrecy guaranteed. Reply, in strict confidence, B 148, printers.

This advertisement caused no little comment at the time. The comic weeklies took it up and elaborated it. One of them gave a column of imaginary wants as follows:—

WANTED, a good Garrotter; must be active and muscular. Permanent employment if competent.

WANTED, a smart Assassin; Must thoroughly understand his business. Amateurs need not apply.

WANTED, an old-fashioned Highwayman; experience on the road necessary.

WANTED, a clever Pickpocket; one with good record of criminal convictions preferred.

FORGER Wanted; must be able to forge any signature from that of the Emperor of Russia to that of Horace Greely.

The Need for Sleep.

It is a mistake to try to do altogether without sleep during an arduous feat of endurance lasting several days. Such is the verdict of Mr. Mills upon his late bicycle ride from Land's End to John o'Groat's. When within four miles of the goal, it was not muscular exhaustion that made him lose seven hours spent in sleeping. It was simply a feeling of drowsiness so strong that not the prayers and entreaties, nor even the repeated shakings of his friend who had come to see him perform the last part of his journey, could rouse the companion to make one short final spurt. Experience has forced upon Mr. Mills the conviction that at least two hours' sleep a day is essential. He is still confident of being able to do the journey, under favorable conditinos in three and a half days.—London News.

In the Summer Holidays.

"What is the matter, landlord? You seem greatly upset."

"And for very good reason, sir! In the ruins you have just been shown over there was a ghost that brought us a crowd of sight seers."

"Well?"

"Why, he has just given me notice to quit at the quarter's end!"—Nouvelles a la Main.

St. Hilaire seems to be a pretty good wheat market this fall, the different wheat men paying more than the market calls for. It is making things lively and the farmer is the winner.

Anton Sundahl, a farmer east of here bought a horse power threshing machine at Crookston last week and it arrived here last Monday. It will be a big thing for the farmers in that vicinity as very little threshing has been done there.

The St. Hilaire orchestra go down to Red Lake Falls to morrow night to play at a Thanksgiving ball, The boys produce good music and we predict that they will prove satisfactory to the people there.

The Norwegian Lutheran auction and social last Thursday evening was one of the most successful affairs of the kind ever held here. The object of the entertainment was to raise money to provide chairs for the Church and they succeeded in raising over $70. Oysters and coffee were served and the St. Hilaire orchestra furnished music.

Minneapolis is a winner and the National Republican Convention will be held in that fair city on June 7th 1892. This decision was reached last Monday at Washington by the National Republican Committee. New York, Cincinnatti, Omaha, San Francisco and Detroit were prominent candidates for the honor but Minnesota's metropolis carried off the plum in the seventh ballot this is a distinguished honor for Minneapolis and the state of Minnesota as it will bring many thousands of people into the state at the best time of the year.

Tomorrow is Thankesgiving and the people of the Red River Valley have much to be thankful for. It is true things have not been as good as they might have been, still they might have been a great deal worse. Let everyone tomorrow give thanks for the bountiful crops of the past year, and let us all hope that on each succeeding Thanksgiving we will have cause to be more thankful than before.

At sixteen a girl wants a dude with toothpick shoes and microscope mustache; at twenty, a chief-justice with lots of tin, at twenty-five she'll be satisfied with a member of congress; at thirty a country doctor or preacher will do; at thirty-five anything that wears pants from an editor up.—Amoret Chief.

Winnipeg Tribune: At Gretna, on the Canadian side, said a wheat dealer to a reporter today, No. 1 hard is selling for 60 cents a bushel, while at Neche, on the American side, it brings 78 cents The average difference in price on all grades of wheat amounts to 20 cents per bushel in favor of the American producer.

There will be a Thanksgiving ball at Opera Hall Thursday evening next by the St. Hilaire orchestra. This orchestra is said to produce fine music, so those who enjoy dancing and feel in a thankful mood should go. The tickets will be 75 cents. The band is made up as follows: Clarionette—Prof. Kupor; cornet, E. H. Strannhan; 1st violin E. J. Holmes; 2d violin, Martin Williams; bass viol, Will Peters. A competent caller will be engaged.—Red Lake Falls.

Within two years, according to Postmaster General Wannamaker, the department over which he presides will again be self-sustaining. As the post office department is not desired to be a source of revenue the one cent postage is a thing of the immediate future. Could something be done to stimulate the cacoethes scribendi among the people postage would be almost an airy nothing within a decade.

The price of wheat was a little higher the first of the week but a telegram this morning announced a drop of two cents and No. 1 hard is only worth 78 cents here at present. This seems a very low price but it looks now as if it would be some time before it is much higher. Wheat is pouring into terminal points faster than ever before and if it were not for the heavy foreign demand the bottom would drop clear out of the market,

Iver Berns, of East Grand Forks, crazed by liquor shot a saloon keeper of that place last Monday afternoon, It is feared that the wounded man will die. His name is John Vorsler. Berns is in jail and the tax payers of Polk County will have another murder trial to pay for. It would be a blessing for Polk County if East Grand Forks was located in Hel—ena Texas or some other place,

The Farm Stock and Home, says: "Do not let this year's big wheat crop and the unusually great foreign demand for it blind you to the fact that kind fortune may not smile so upon you again in a lifetime; neither let it make you forget the dairy cow, the friend that has stood by you in time of need, given you freely of her substance and never failed to bring a constant income. Do not let such an infrequent streak of good luck induce you to give up the certain profit of dairying for the uncertain profit of exclusive wheat raising,"

Dr. Lankaster, D. G. M., and Thomas Erwin, P. G., of the Fisher lodge I. O O. F., went down to St. Hilaire on Monday last to visit Mr. Lucius Ames, who is a member of the lodge. They found Lucius much better than could be expected and made arrangements to have him removed to Fisher, as soon as he was able to make the journey, so that the brothers here could give him better attention. This lodge is determined to carry out the true fraternal relationship of Odd Fellows, so far as it is possible, —Fisher Bulletin.

It is not uncommon for farmers to complain of their hard calling and the lack of profit, and yet the northwest is full of men who started without a dollar and are now worth several hundreds or several thousands, as is apparent when an offer is made to buy them out. A man who makes a living for himself and family from his farm and gradually pays for his land improvements and farm impliments and gathers around him horses, cattle and sheep, is making money faster than he could in any other calling, If he does not believe this he has only to try some other calling to learn his mistake.—Fisher Bulletin.

The Chinese question will be before congress again this winter. It has been supposed that the legislation to keep the Joss worshipers out of the country could be effectively executed. Its provisions are conceded to be sufficiently rigid if they could be enforced. They are like a good deal of other prohibitory legislation only constraining in theory. Inspector Tingle's report, published in the Globe sets forth the situation on the Canadian border. They are shipped from China to Vancouver by the thousands, The government there imposes a tax of $50 per head and a sort of ticket of leave is given them, If they can ship across the border into the United States and are forced back they have no new tax to pay, The $50 duty makes it an object to encourage their importation, and it is not presumed that the official sensibilities are greatly touched if the vigilence of the United States authorities is insufficient to keep them out of this country. They are not wanted on the Canadian side, but their $50 per head is At no time since the exclusion act was passed was the influx of Chinese been so great as now, The law is likely to become pretty nearly a dead letter unless some more efficient mode of enforcement is divised.—St. Paul Globe.

The cable furnishes, apparently, solid confirmation of the rather well-worn report that that the Russian government had determined to prohibit wheat exports from its territory. Last week Russia exported 4,500,000 bushels of wheat, and it is believed that her exportable surplus aggregated some 40,000,000 bushels. This decree not only is confirmatory of breadstuffs shortage in Russia but coupled with the announcement that a decree prohibiting the export of horses will soon be promulgated, indicates that the military situation is becoming more serious and that the Emperor Franz Josef's ominous remark about continental peace, recently, in the absence of any reassurance from the German Emperor at the opening of the reichstag this week meant conviction of coming disturbance The Czars realm is to day in such a state of social disturbance that he might resort to foreign war, as he has done before to divert public attention from the rottenness and injustice of the autocratic and military system of which he is the centre. The situation is, of course, favorable for our breadstuffs and stock and bond market.

THE POCAHONTAS TALE.

TRUE VERSION OF THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL LEGEND.

Pocahontas Did Not Save John Smith's Life, but Interceded in Behalf of One of Her Lovers, Who Was Doomed to Die and Whom She Did Not Marry.

"It is strange and incomprehensible, nevertheless a fact, that raconteurs, from the time of the first liar down to the present age of Mulhattons and Munchausens, with a wonderful unanimity persist in falsifying and twisting the truth into an unrecognizable quantity," said Colonel George as he gazed at the wondrous landscape panoramically coming into view.

We were speeding over the beautiful sea green waters of the Chesapeake bay on the steamer Ariel from Norfolk to Richmond. I made the acquaintance on board of the gentleman who gave utterance to the above sage remark. When the colonel spoke the boat was on the eve of passing historical Jamestown, and the passengers had grouped themselves together on the lee side to catch a fleeting glimpse of the ivy clad front wall of the old church, standing sentinel-like on a peninsula formed point of land.

As we rounded the wide bend of the river, and the church, the sole remaining relic standing on the scene of the romance of Captain Smith and Pocahontas, hove into view, the colonel resumed his conversation, or rather monologue:

"You must have noticed in your lifetime how a story will grow as it is repeated from lip to lip—how the truth becomes distorted and subjected to innumerable alterations of fact. In illustration of this," said the colonel thoughtfully, "I will relate you an Indian legend recalled to my mind by that old ruin," pointing to the church wall which the boat was just then gliding by. "The story, as I heard it, was told me by an old farmer, well known in the neighborhood, on my last trip up the James river, just before the war."

POCAHONTAS REAL NAME.

Jamestown vanishing from sight, the colonel and I returned to the cabin, sought seats away from the crowd of passengers and I settled myself comfortably to listen to the tale.

"When Captain John Smith made the first settlement in Virginia, the white and red man lived on terms of amity and confidence," began Colonel George "Caucasian and Indian mingled with each other and were held in mutual esteem. Until the outcropping of the greediness and avariciousness of the Englishmen became apparent, peace and prosperity smiled on the hardy settlers

"In the village ruled by Powhatan there dwelt a lovely Indian maiden Her skin was the color of polished copper her hair of raven's hue and her eyes sparkled as the morning star veiled behind a gathering storm cloud Warriors from far and near sought her hand in marriage, but her heart remained invulnerable to all vows of love and devotion However, when the white man invaded the habitations of the Indians, among their number was a youth comely to look upon, famed for his courage and manly qualities Tetehee, in the course of her many visits to the newly founded village on the James river, cast her eyes on handsome Homer Castalwain, and, lo! the little Indian god of love pierced her heart with his arrow, and she loved him with all an Indian maiden's fierceness.

"Now, Chief Opechancanough, one of Powhatan's tributary rulers, had a son who was madly in love with Tetehee the Morning Star. Bankee (Black Bear) was a cruel and vindictive Indian, and when he learned that Tetehee's heart belonged to a despised white man he swore vengeance upon his tomahawk against Homer Castalwain.

THE TRUE VERSION

"In the soft Indian summer, with nature aglow with variegated colors, Tetehee, in company with the other maidens and squaws of the village, was gathering the golden ripe maize for winter use from the fields of the king While the maidens were at work Bankee raided the cornfields of the powerful Powhatan, carrying off to his own village the object of his savage affections He meant to coerce Tetehee into marriage while in his power, raise a war party, attack the settlement of the white men and exterminate it.

"Castalwain, upon hearing of the threatened danger of his lovely Indian bride-to-be, accompanied by Captain John Smith, supplicated King Powhatan for aid to rescue her This was granted. So, with a war party composed of Indians and settlers, under the leadership of Smith, Opechancanough's village was surprised in the midst of his son's wedding festivities. Tetehee rescued and Bankee captured and carried before King Powhatan.

"Then it was that his fate was decreed—death by beheading, so to speak. As Bankee's head lay on the stone, a huge Indian standing over him, Pocahontas rushed between the upraised club and prostrate man and begged her father, the king, for his life—not from love, however, but simply through pity and weakness of heart.

"This is the true version of the world wide famous legend of Captain Smith and Pocahontas, which poets and historians have handed down for generations. It is a sample of what a truth undergoes—how it is garbled as related by one and another in the course of narration. The accuracy of the story is undoubted in my mind, as it is a well authenticated fact in the neighborhood in which the old farmer lives, that he is the last living descendant of Homer Castalwain and Tetehee, the Indian maiden."—Atlanta Constitution.

PAYING THE BLOOD TAX.

PEASANTS PAY MONEY FOR MURDERS COMMITTED IN 1375.

A Debt Which the Inhabitants of the Pyrenees Have Religiously Paid Annually for Over Five Centuries—The Ceremony Described by a Witness.

The Independent des Basses-Pyrenees publishes a very interesting description written by M. Alfred Cadier, a French Protestant clergyman at Pau, of a ceremonial which he witnessed on the frontier of France and Spain. This consisted in the payment of a blood tax, and it appears that there are two or three places in the Pyrenees where the custom, founded upon the belief that "a murder committed by the inhabitants of a village or canton upon those of an adjoining village or canton must forever remain a burden upon the descendants of their descendants," is still observed.

Thus, about the middle of the Fourteenth century, the inhabitants of the valley of Lavedan, having massacred the defenseless residents of Aspe, were condemned by the pope to pay a perpetual tax of thirty sols, which was levied upon twenty-two villages and paid up to the time of the revolution. In the Thirteenth century, if not earlier, a similar crime was committed between the valleys of Baretons, in French Navarre, and Roncal, in Spanish Navarre.

The blood tax which the inhabitants of the former were ordered by the pope to discharge is paid still, the ceremony taking place annually on July 13 in the mountains, about seven hours' march from Osse, at the pass known as La Peyre St. Martin. It is thus described by M. Cadier:

A GALA SCENE.

A crowd of people is to be seen making their way to the rendezvous. The shepherds of the Baretons valley, with their red waistcoats interspersed with dark threads, the mayors and delegates of the villages of Arette, Laune, Aramits and Isaor, the foresters of the mountain, the custom house officers without their guns, the clergy, represented by the priest of St. Engrace and two curates, and a few English tourists from Osse helped to make up this singular assembly. When we reached the narrow stone which marks off the frontier, with the name St. Martin inscribed upon the two sides of it in French and Spanish, we found ourselves face to face with the Spaniards, who formed an imposing group.

First was the alcalde of Isaba, who was to act the part of lord chief justice. He was wearing a black robe, bordered with red, and a large collarette by way of bands, while he carried in his hand the wand of justice, in the shape of a black stick with a silver knob. The alcaldes of three or four other Spanish villages were similarly attired, and they were accompanied by a numerous suite, made up of delegates from the general junta of the valley of Roncal, the notary, the veterinarian, and others, the escort consisting of seven or eight armed carabineros and guards, while in the rear were a number of "bourriqueros," who had come in the hope of selling the skins of wine with which their donkeys were loaded.

It was about 9 a. m. when the ceremonial, which has been observed without interruption since 1375, commenced by the French mayors donning their tricolor scarf, and by the Spanish alcaldes advancing toward the frontier stone, accompanied by a herald bearing a lance on which was painted a red flame, the symbol of justice.

THE CEREMONY.

The two parties having halted at a distance of about twenty feet from their respective frontiers, the herald substitutes for his red flame a white one, which is the symbol of pacific intentions, and the alcalde of Isaba exclaims in Spanish, "Do you wish for peace?" To this the French mayors reply in the affirmative, also speaking in Spanish, and in order to testify to the sincerity of their intentions, their herald lays down his lance upon the top of the stone in the direction of the frontier, whereupon the Spanish herald comes and inserts his lance into the French soil, resting the shaft against the stone so as to form a cross with the French lance. The mayor of Arette then comes and lays his hand upon the cross so formed, a Spanish alcalde places his right hand upon that of the Frenchman and the other mayors and alcaldes do the same alternately.

Last of all, the alcalde of Isaba steps forward, and, lifting his wand of justice over the pile of hands, pronounces the oath, which all swear to keep. After this oath has been taken the alcalde of Isaba exclaims three times, "Pax daraus" (peace in the future). Peace is thus anew concluded, and to ratify their having given up all idea of vengeance the men of Roncal order the escort to discharge their guns in the direction of France. Then comes the reception of the blood tax, which used to consist of three perfectly white mares, but owing to the difficulty of getting them exactly alike three white heifers have been substituted for them. The three heifers presented this year were worth about twenty-three pounds, which is a large sum for the district, and after the Roncal notary had drawn up a proces verbal, which was signed all around, a repast was served at the expense of the Spaniards, toasts being proposed in honor of Spain, France and England, the introduction of England being due to the presence of several English visitors. After the repast was over dancing followed, and we then said goodby till next year.

How a Plant Protects Itself.

One little plant of South Africa protects itself by assuming a curious likeness to a white lichen that covers the rocks; the plant has sharp pointed green leaves; these are placed close together with their points upward and on the tip of each leaf is a little white, scaly sheath. The resemblance of the smooth surface these present to the lichen growing on the rocks, beside which it is always found, is so great that it is not till you tread on it that you discover the deception.—Fortnightly Review.

The Courtesy of Assassins.

It will be remembered that some time ago Mr. Constantine Belcheff, the minister of finances, was unskillfully shot and killed while walking in the streets of Sofia in company with M. Stambuloff, the prime minister. It was thought at the time that M. Belcheff was the victim of mistaken identity, and this belief has been confirmed by the following apology which has been carved on his tombstone: "Forgive us; we aimed at Stambuloff and struck you. The second time we will not fail."—General M. M. Trumbull in Open Court.

The Danger from Cold Drinks.

"In my opinion," said a physician, "it is not so great a mistake to indulge in cold drinks in warm weather as it is to drink them rapidly. On a hot day it is almost inevitable that people should drink, and what the system seems to crave is something cold. If that something could be a little less than ice cold it would be so much the better. But it is practically out of the question to get a drink of a temperature of 40 or 42 degs., say, which is about as cold as is necessary in order to meet the demands of nature.

"So, then, ice cold drinks are likely to remain a permanency, and thousands and thousands of people will continue to drink them. Now, what I should advise is that they perform the operation with some deliberation. The man who swallows a glass of soda water or anything else at a temperature of 32 or thereabout does a dangerous thing. The danger is in suddenly chilling the nerves of the stomach, and the result may be sudden paralysis. There is neither sense nor reason in drinking thus rapidly.

"I do not mean, on the other hand, that it is necessary to wait until the drink, whatever it is, has grown warm. What I plead for is that people should take fifteen or twenty seconds, or even half a minute, in swallowing a glass of soda or beer or whatever they use to satisfy their thirst. Everybody can afford that much time—even the most hurried man—and the result cannot fail to be decidedly advantageous in the long run."—New York Tribune.

Fought with Jackson at New Orleans.

Jose Cardova, who was 106 years old, is dead. The cause of his death was old age. He has been working as a laborer up to two years ago, when he quit, incapacitated.

Jose Cardova was born in New Orleans, and was twenty-seven years old and serving in Old Hickory's army when the latter beat the British out of that city. Before he left New Orleans he had acquired the English and French languages in addition to the language of his father, and after he moved to Nacogdoches, Tex., he was such a well informed man that it did not take him long, in the rude Mexican conditions prevailing there, to build up a competence.

The fortune went, though by some process not clearly recorded, and in 1836 he moved to San Antonio, where he has since lived. He leaves a wife, aged ninety-eight years.—San Antonio Express.

Railway Car Heating by Electricity.

It is reassuring to know that the "deadly car stove," which has played such a ghastly part in hundreds of tragedies, will soon be seen no more. An admirable system of electric heating for cars has been invented, which is so cheap and easily operated that its universal adoption is simply a matter of time. The railway company on whose road this system has been tested by a course of practical work speaks of it in the highest terms, and the traveling public is not less gratified at the comfort and safety which is now assured. After the sad experience of the dirty and gaseous condition of the average coal heated car, the absolute cleanliness and absence of odors, together with the even temperature of a car electrically heated, is a revolution in modern car heating.—New York Telegram.

"German Syrup"

Martinsville, N.J., Methodist Parsonage. "My acquaintance with your remedy, Boschee's German Syrup, was made about fourteen years ago, when I contracted a Cold which resulted in a Hoarseness and a Cough which disabled me from filling my pulpit for a number of Sabbaths. After trying a Physician, without obtaining relief—I cannot say now what remedy he prescribed—I saw the advertisement of your remedy and obtained a bottle. I received such quick and permanent help from it that whenever we have had Throat or Bronchial troubles since in our family, Boschee's German Syrup has been our favorite remedy and always with favorable results. I have never hesitated to report my experience of its use to others when I have found them troubled in like manner." Rev. W. H. Haggarty, of the Newark, New Jersey, M.E. Conference, April 25, '90.

THANKSGIVING'S COMING.

Let winds blow cold, let winds blow high,
Let days be dark and drear.
Who cares? Thanksgiving's drawing nigh—
A time of mirth and cheer.

What though we burn wood by the cord
And weather prophets croak?
Soon on the groaning, festive board
The turkey, stuffed, will smoke.

Then something to the poor we'll spare—
Who're always with us here—
And we'll forget all grief and care
In sweet Thanksgiving cheer.

—Boston Courier.

A LUCKY BLIZZARD.

The Story of a Glad Thanksgiving at Rose Ranch.

WHEN the long pampas grass was green, Rose ranch was one of the prettiest little places in all Northern Texas; but now that it was sere and dead, Rose ranch looked glum and drear under the pallid November sky.

Somehow the appearance of things had an unusual effect on the young lord and master of this domain, and he felt glum and drear too. He stood on the front step of the little white dwelling which he had built with his own hands, and leaned against one of the heavy door-posts, scowling dismally.

What a big, strong, handsome fellow John Ellsworth was! It was odd that he never married, being at least twenty-seven. He was just the man to win all women's love, and there was so much of him to get lonesome. But his life had been devoted to sterner things than thoughts of love; notwithstanding his indomitable spirit and his untiring industry, it had taken him years, single-handed and equipped as he was, to bring his Texas home to its present value.

While standing ruminating at the door John's vision was greeted by the appearance of Jessie Carell, the "schoolmarm o' Sassafras," as some called her, who lived at Colonel Bludsoe's, a mile to the north of Rose ranch, and taught the Sassafras school, nearly three miles to the south. She passed John's home, therefore, every day, and sometimes he joined her and accompanied her to the door of the school-house. This was when Cephas Bludsoe was not along.

She was a sweet little woman; no one could help thinking that.

Usually she rode a black pony on her trips back and forth to school, but on this particular morning, she was walking.

John brightened at sight of her, and as she came up and smiled a greeting he went down the path and took possession of her books and lunch-basket.

"How's it come you're walkin' this morning?" he asked, as they passed down the road. "Where's the pony?"

"'Doc got out among the range horses last night," she answered, "an' I thought I wouldn't wait till he was caught. I can stand walkin' to-day, as there's no school at all to-morrow."

"Thanksgivin'—thet's so. But it's too far fer you to walk, Jessie. I'll see thet you ride back this evening. I'll have one o' my ponies down to the school-house fer you."

"Cephas is goin' to bring 'Doc' down, he said." Her eyes fell as she said this.

The frown returned to John's brow, darker than ever. He said nothing for a moment. Then he shifted the books on his arm, and muttered something to the effect that it "might snow big for Thanksgivin.'"

"Sister Carrie's comin' to-day to spend Thanksgivin' and a month with me," he informed her presently.

"Comin' from Ohio?"

"Yes. She'll get to Houston station on the afternoon train, an' I'll meet 'er."

"From all you've told me about Carrie I think I'd like to see her very much," remarked the young schoolma'am, earnestly.

"Would you?" said John. "I'll tell you: s'pose you spend thanksgivin' at Rose ranch, an' Carrie'll get up a rousin' dinner for us."

"I'm sorry," she began, paused, and continued: "I'm sorry, but I promised Cephas to go over to Galloway's with him tomorrow."

"Seems like you an' Cephas are havin' a good deal to do with one another o' late," John muttered in a hard voice. Then he added: "I've been thinkin' o' you all mornin'." Judging from the way he spoke this, it was not unlikely that his thoughts of her had affected him more than the weather.

"I hope you thought good things," she said, pleasantly.

"I heard you an' Cephas were goin' to marry, Christmas-times," he said, abruptly.

She glanced up at him quickly.

"Who told that?" she asked.

The subject was suddenly dropped at this point. Cephas Bludsoe came riding up and blusteringly saluted them.

"Gloomy day, ain't it, Ellsworth?" he remarked. "Hope it won't snow afore I get back from the station. Goin' down to-day, John?"

"To the station? Yes, this afternoon," John answered quietly.

"I'll see you there, maybe."

"She didn't deny it," he muttered. "I reckon it must be so."

That afternoon he went to Houston station, which was a good eight miles from Rose ranch, and when the train from the north came there was Carrie, as radiant and gladsome as of old.

As the two started in the little spring wagon for the ranch, John noticed Cephas entering the station's liquor resort in company with two young fellows who were notorious ne'er-do-wells. It proved that this was the beginning of a great Thanksgiving drunk on the part of the three.

"Seems like he's forgot his promise to take the black pony fer Jessie," John thought.

Brother and sister were rejoiced at meeting again after their long separation, and the miles were traveled quickly.

However, they had hardly left the station when John noticed a peculiar change in the atmosphere. It grew cold and the sky was lowering. Evidently a storm was near.

He whipped up the horses and they sped along rapidly.

Darker and darker grew the heavens. John thought he had never known a storm approach so swiftly.

It became bitterly cold, and the wind blew from the north. Suddenly the sleet and snow began to fall, and John knew that they were in the midst of one of those terrible blizzards of the Southwest.

He made Carrie as comfortable as possible with his big buffalo robe and her shawls, and bundled up himself all he could, but still they suffered from the cold.

By the time they reached Sassafras school-house there were two feet of snow on the ground, and it was falling in a blinding flood.

The building was deserted and locked. John thought of Cephas in the saloon at the station, and wondered if Jessie had waited for the black pony.

They were still more than a mile from Rose ranch, when a human form, prostrate in the snow, caused the horses to shy and brought an exclamation from John.

He drew the team to a standstill, and, passing the lines to his sister, leaped from his seat and bent over the storm's victim.

"Great Heavens, Carrie!" he cried, "it's Jessie—the school-ma'am o' Sassafras!"

Carrie did not hear him. Stung by driving sleet and biting cold, and frightened perhaps by their master's sudden spring from his seat, the spirited horses had plunged forwards, and finding no restraining hand on the bits, for Carrie's hands were stiff and numb with the cold, they dashed away over the prairie, leaving John standing helplessly in the snow over the inanimate form of the little teacher!

John lost not a moment in idle contemplation of the situation.

Gathering the little teacher in his strong arms, and holding her close against his breast, that she might absorb of the warmth from his own person, he boldly struck through the snow in the wake of the team, which had now entirely disappeared in the storm.

At last Rose ranch was reached and there at the gate stood the runaway team, with heads down and their bodies quivering with cold, and at the door was Carrie, uninjured and half-warmed by the fire which burned in the grate, and in the act of dispatching Vasques, the herder, to John's relief.

John did not tell her where Cephas was, but he remarked that she could not go to Galloway's now, and after all would be their Thanksgiving guest. She was glad of it, she said.

The two had a long talk the next day while Carrie was preparing that rousing dinner.

"Cephas told it," he said, in answer to her repeated question.

"Well, it is not the least bit true," she informed him. "I'd never marry Cephas Bludsoe!"

Then the big, honest boy found expression for his love at last, and he was electrified by the sweetness of her answer.—Arthur C. Grissom.

How to Pour Bottled Beer.

At dinner, not long ago, some gentleman who were sitting at table with Hugo Blanck, the noted chemist, observed that he exercised the greatest care in pouring out a glass of beer. He tilted the bottle gently and slowly, so that the liquid passed from the bottle to the glass without the least disturbance, and when the glass was full it had no collar or froth upon it.

"I could have understood your case," said one, "If you had been drinking Bass' ale or Guinness' stout, that go on a rampage if not gingerly handled, but I confess I can't see why you bother so much about a glass of lager."

Mr. Blanck cast a kindly look of compassion upon the critic and said: "I thought every beer drinker knew that it should be poured so as to avoid froth. Surely such a simple yet important fact is generally known. No? I'm astonished. Why, if you pour out lager beer headlong into a glass, allowing foam to fill half the measure, you lose the best ingredient in the beer, the invigorating, lively tonic—carbonic acid gas. Pour the beer slowly and so," and Mr. Blanck illustrated his meaning by holding glass and bottle inclined together, "and you retain the carbonic acid gas in the beer. In the old country more attention to this essential precaution is paid, but I thought every one knew about it here, even if they overlook its importance."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

New York's Boy Choir.

In 1869 there were but three boy choirs in New York—in Trinity Church, Trinity Chapel and St John's. After four or five years the next boy choir was organized through the exertions of Mr. Hatch, the banker, for Christ Church on Fifth avenue, which is now demolished. After an interval of seven or eight years, boy choirs seemed to spring up in all directions. The ritualistic movement in the Episcopal Church no doubt had much to do with the introduction of this kind of music, though boy choirs are now found in what are called the "low" and "evangelical" branches of the Church, and in some of the sectarian churches. There are now in Brooklyn and New York between sixty and seventy boy choirs, and counting New Jersey and the suburbs there must be one hundred of them. The boy choir of Trinity Chapel is the best known in the city, and this is the only church in the United States which has a daily choral service. The choir consists of thirty members—twelve men and eighteen boys. Boy singers are usually obtained from the public schools, but a church of reputation never has any difficulty in securing all the talent it needs.—Epoch.

A Fable on Wheels.

Once upon a time a Lamb and a Hog started to go on a journey. In due course they reached a railroad Station and they waited for a Train. Presently one came thundering by and pulled up at the Platform with great Pomp and Circumstance.

"Gee whiz," exclaimed the Lamb, as he grabbed for his Hat, "ain't she a Hustler."

"You bet," replied the Hog, picking up his Satchel and making a Bolt for a Coach.

"Where are you going?" asked the startled lamb. "This train is not for us. We belong in that Stock Car over there on the Siding!"

"Maybe you do," sneered the Hog, "but I'm not that kind," and he jumped aboard the Train and was soon occupying four Seats, while the Lamb tried to make himself comfortable in the Wood-box in the deadly Stove-corner of the Car.—Detroit Free Press.

GRATIFYING TO ALL.

The high position attained and the universal acceptance and approval of the pleasant liquid fruit remedy Syrup of Figs, as the most excellent laxative known, illustrate the value of the qualities on which its success is based and are abundantly gratifying to the California Fig Syrup Company.

Not a Local Disease

Because Catarrh affects your head, it is not therefore a local disease. If it did not exist in your blood, it could not manifest itself in your nose. The blood now in your brain is before you finish reading this article, back in your heart again and soon distributed to your liver, stomach, kidneys, and so on. Whatever impurities the blood does not carry away, cause what we call diseases. Therefore, when you have a snuff or other inhalant can at most give only temporary relief. The only way to effect a cure is to attack the disease in the blood, by taking a constitutional remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which eliminates all impurities and thus permanently cures Catarrh. The success of

Hood's Sarsaparilla

As a remedy for Catarrh is vouched for by many people it has cured. N. B. Be sure to get Hood's.

New Branches of Industry.

Four tramps meet in a public thoroughfare. "Halloa!" says one. "We see you always together, nowadays!"

"Lude and I are in partnership; he makes horses shy and I hold them and get paid for doing so, We afterwards go shares in the money. But what are you doing?"

"We are employed by a practical dentist."

"Do you understand the business?"

"I should think we did; we get up a row, there's a regular fight, in which people get their teeth smashed, and and when it is over the dentist goes round and distributes his cards."—Humoristiche Blatter.

Fire at Belle Plain destroyed William Hanson's jewelry and stove store. Dodd's harness shop and other small buildings. Several persons working at the fire were severely hurt.

A. Fernbach, proprietor of the Western Hotel, at Waterloo while going up an outside stairway to his rooms, fell over the railing at the top and was instantly killed. His skull was fractured and neck broken. He leaves a wife and child.

In a saloon dispute at Struble, William McFarland struck Tony Wenner, the saloonkeeper, with a piece of iron, breaking a hole in his skull below the ear so that the brain oozed out. Wenner is dying. McFarland was lodged in jail at Le Mars within two hours after the assault.

Sheriff Rule, of Franklin county, served an attachment on G. H. King, contractor on the new court house, for Fraser & Shepard of Minneapolis, who have been furnishing material for the building. This action will cause delay in the completion of the building.

Armstrong Wilson, an inmate of the county poorhouse, at Eldora, was suffocated to death by coal gas escaping from a hard coal stove. Some half-witted inmate of the institution had opened the lid of the stove and left it open, and three other paupers were overcome and barely escaped death. Wilson was a pioneer settler of Hardin county, and had been insane for ten years, but being considered harmless was not sent to an asylum.

A BAFFLED LYNCHING BEE.

An Indianapolis Mob Storm the Jail but Are Repulsed.

Indianapolis, Ind., Dec. 1.—The county jail, situated in the very center of the city, was surrounded by a mob of 300 infuriated people shortly before midnight thirsting for the blood of Charles Birsow, a ravisher, confined within its walls. The man is an all-round criminal, and this latest crime was an outrageous assault on a little girl named Blanche Staton, seven years of age, living in the northeastern part of the city. A few men gathered in the rear of a saloon in the same portion of the city, and this was soon added to.

A descent was made upon the jail by fifty sturdy fellows, and in the march a force of 200 men joined in. The jail, a flimsy old structure, was easily entered, but the mob got no further than the strong doors in the office. At one time they were upon the point of going into the blows of the sledge hammers and delving of crowbars, but the sheriff and a posse of officers cleared the room by a hard effort. Once dispersed the backbone of the gang weakened, and from then on only cries of: "We want the brute; lynch him," "give him to us," etc. The office again filled, but there was no further attempt at breaking into the body of the jail.

Twenty minutes after the first attempt the jail was surrounded by officers. The ringleaders held another meeting within two squares of the jail a few minutes later. A plan is now on foot to break into the blacksmith shop in the vicinity and secure more tools. An attack will be made at 4 o'clock in the morning. A force of several hundred stone masons, with some laborers in the pork packing establishments, are organizing in the southern part of the city and will be at the jail in two hours.

Dec. 1.—2:10 a. m.: The mob has dispersed and the jail is full of police.

BALFOUR'S BELIEFS.

The New Government Leader Laughs at the Liberals.

London, Dec. 1.—Mr. Balfour, first lord of the treasury, delivered a political address at Huddersfield to-day.

He said that Ireland, as an electoral cry, was played out. The Liberal leaders appeared to be in doubt whether to play on home rule or the agricultual vote. The Liberals had promised to deal with the question of village councils, but this was but a clumsy method of putting a coping stone on local self-government. It was not likely that village councils would materially alter the condition of the laborer.

After announcing that Mr. Chaplin, the president of the board of agriculture, would at an early day introduce a small holdings bill, Mr. Balfour pointed out that some difficulty would arise from the vital difference between the conditions in Ireland and the conditions in England. In the former country, he said, small holdings were already in existence, while in the latter they had to deal everywhere with large estates, with buildings which would become worthless by conversion into allotments. He rather doubted the success of the Liberals' espousal of the agricultural question. Their heads, he said, had been turned by election successes.

For Educational Purposes.

Washington, Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—Representative Sayers of Texas, who in the last congress was the leading member of the Democrats on the appropriations committee and in all probability the next chairman of the committee, has already been asked by Western members to be liberal in the matter of appropriations for surveying public lands. Representative Wilson of Washington told him that it would be a saving if appropriations were made to survey all the lands and have it over. Sayers says he is not only in favor of that, but is in favor of turning all the public lands now left over to the states in which they are situated, to be used for educational purposes.

Three Tariff Cases.

Washington, Dec. 1.—The three tariff cases involving the constitutionality of the McKinley tariff act came up for argument in the United States supreme court to-day. All the justices were present. The three cases before the court are those of Boyd, Sutton & Co., and Sternbach & Co. of New York city and Marshall Field & Co. of Chicago against the collectors of customs of New York and Chicago respectively. Three points are involved in the decision of these suits, and the court heard all the cases as one. Arguments will continue to-morrow.

Threshing Behind Time

LeSueur, Minn., Special, Dec. 1.—Threshers who have returned from Grand Forks county and Devils Lake, N. D., report that the grain there is only half threshed, and that the farmers are stacking the remainder and will wait till spring to thresh. The yield was from thirty to forty bushels to the acre. The threshers left their outfits and will return in the spring.

His Stock Seized.

Appleton, Wis., Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—Executions were issued to-night on judgment notes and levy made on the stock of Leopold Jacobs for $13,775.27, of which $8,366.70 was in favor of David Hammel, $1,833.01 in favor of Fred Losle and $3,575.56 in favor of Samuel Marsnall. His assets will not much more than cover this. Total liabilities unknown.

Commodious and Convenient.

Fargo, N. D., Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—Alex Stern has purchased fifty feet of land adjoining the present opera house for $10,000 and proposes to add to the present hall in the spring and make as convenient and commodious an opera house as it is possible to find in the Northwest. This is greatly needed.

An Engineer Scalded.

Chippewa Falls, Wis., Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—Joseph Werner, engineer at the Spring brewery in this city, was terribly burned about the arms and body yesterday by escaping steam from the exhaust pipe, which he was thawing out. The burns are not thought to be fatal.

Fire at a University.

New Orleans, Dec. 1.—A disastrous fire occurred here to-day, destroying the main building, the library and several other buildings belonging to the Straight university for colored people. The loss is $300,000. The buildings were owned by the American Missionary Association of New York.

Three Men Cremated.

Wheeling, W. Va., Dec. 1.—Late tonight the Union Window Glass works, at Bellaire, Ohio, our miles below this city, caught fire and burned to the ground. Three men are supposed to have perished in the flames. The loss will reach $80,000.

Another Train Robbery.

St. Louis, Dec. 1.—West-bound Passenger Train No. on the 'Frisco road was held up and robbed by masked men at Glendale, eight miles from the station, to-night. The train was stopped by the desperadoes, the crew intimidated, and, it is said, a heavy sum of money belonging to the Adams Express company was secured. It is also said that the mail car was rifled of its pouches of registered mail.

The two on the rear end entered the car and blew open the safe, taking all the contents. Express Messenger Mulrennin was badly injured by the explosion. The car was badly wrecked. The amount stolen cannot be learned at this hour.

CHRISTIANS KILLED

Three Hundred European and Native Christians Massacred by the Rebels in China.

The Rebels Feasted by Mandarins at the Conclusion of Their Diabolical Work.

Pekin Dec. 1.—The government is fully aware of the serious condition which confronts it, and every possible step is being taken to break the strength of the rebels before they get within striking distance of the capital.

There is much excitement here among all classes of the population, and the authorities believe that if they can inflict a defeat upon the rebel force it will have a good effect upon the people of Pekin and the vicinity. It is believed that many of the people are secretly in favor of the rebels, but should the imperial forces do battle with the insurgents and defeat them the malcontents would then side with the government.

No doubt is entertained that the situation is extremely dangerous. Should the rebel forces continue to advance toward the capital, in spite of the efforts of the imperial troops to prevent them, it is feared by the foreigners that the whole country will rise and aid the invaders. The garrison of Shankaikwan has been sent to suppress other insurrectionary bodies which are marching in various directions through the country, evidently with the intention of joining the main body.

The most serious condition of affairs is that at Takou. This is the place where the most brutal outrages were committed upon the Christian priests, nuns and native converts. What action the government will take in this matter it is hard to say. That the authorities are in full sympathy with the perpetrators of these most horrible crimes there is no reason to doubt. The first reports from Takou stated that after these fiends had worked their bloody will on all the Christian men, women and children who fell into their hands they were feasted by the leading Chinese mandarins in the district. It is now said that the local mandarins agreed to allow the rebels free license for provided they did no harm to the other inhabitants. These terms were accepted by the rebels, and they pursued their work without let or hindrance. Three hundred Europeans and native Christians were massacred. It is believed that not a single Christian in the district escaped.

Consternation prevails among the Protestant missionaries in the district through which it is expected the rebels will pass. The local officials at Tsunha have declared that they are powerless to protect the missionaries, and that if they desired to save their lives they had better seek safety in flight. The missionaries at Tsunha have, therefore, abandoned their stations and sought refuge in safer parts of the country.

Further advices regarding the defeat of the imperial troops by the Mongolian rebels state that many of the former deserted to the rebels, being evidently in sympathy with them, and that the force, which was composed of the flower of the Chinese army, men selected from regiments for their proven courage, showed no spirit whatever in the encounter. It is said that, according to the peculiar methods prevalent at the Pekin court the young emperor is kept ignorant of the dangerous condition of foreign affairs and is entirely taken up with his recent marital arrangements. The war minister, Ole-Hohu, is threatened with disgrace for not having detected the disaffection among the troops, and may lose his head. The rebels are described as adhering to their tribal war organization, and, although merciless in their treatment of those who offer serious resistance, and of foreigners under any circumstances, they are strictly obedient to their own commanders. The Europeans in Shang Hai are getting more and more excited, the general opinion being that the crisis is more acute than that which existed when the Taepings were at the height of their triumph.

ANOTHER CHILIAN SCARE.

No Apology or Indemnity for the Baltimore Affair.

Valparaiso, Dec. 1.—The press correspondent was informed to-day on the authority of an official holding high place in Santiago, that the Chilian government had no intention whatever of offering an apology or indemnity, such as President Harrison required, and had no intention of recalling or moderating the reply given to the American request, and that any expectation that President Montt would in this respect modify the policy adopted by the junta was misleading. The president himself, it is said, was the most earnest advocate in the junta of a defiant retort to the United States and virtually dictated the answer sent to Minister Egan. Montt has not changed his views since he exchanged the office of chief of the junta for that of president, and Chili is silent now because there is nothing to be said.

Meantime, although President Mott has recommended a cutting down of the army and navy, no steps have been taken to carry out the recommendation, and even the volunteers sent back to their homes in the north were told to retain their arms.

Lottery Officers Arrested.

New Orleans, Dec. 1.—President Conrad, Secretary Horner and eight employes of the Louisiana State Lottery company appeared before United States Commissioner Wright to-day to answer an indictment found against them at San Antonio, Tex., upon the charge of violating the anti-lottery postal law. They gave bail in the sum of $1,000 each.

The Dayton Will Case.

Aberdeen, S. D., Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—The circuit court, Judge Campbell presiding, convenes in this city to-morrow. The calendar is not a large one, but contains many important cases, the principal one being Dayton vs. Reed, involving large property interests here and in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Journalistic Lambs for the Slaughter.

Sioux Falls, S. D., Dec. 1.—W. W. Goddard is starting a morning daily here for the Democrats of the state. The Independents will also start a daily at Sioux Falls. Then the Prohibitionists feel that they must be represented in the daily field for the coming campaign.

En Route to Washington.

Red Wing, Special, Dec. 1.—Congressman Hall and family left to-day for Washington to remain there through the session of congress. They will make their home at the National hotel.

FRANCE AND THE VATICAN.

A Threat Against the Church Made by a French Minister.

Paris, Dec. 1.—The Gaulois to-day announces that M. Ribot, minister of foreign affairs, in an interview with Monsignor Ferrati, the papal nuncio in this city, has distinctly informed the latter that unless the Vatican takes steps to cause the archbishops and bishops of France to behave in a more moderate manner towards the French government, France will no longer oppose the separation of church and state.

The members of the Right in the chamber of deputies have sent their congratulations to the archbishop of Aix on his defense of the church. The archbishop of Bordeaux, in an address to the clergy of his archdiocese, said he was not surprised that the incident which recently occurred in the Pantheon should have induced a prelate to protest against the acts of the Italians, though France had not even reminded Italy of the respect due to the French flag.

A plenary meeting of the Republican members of the chamber of deputies has been convoked to decide upon the course of the Republican party, in view of the continued agitation of the clergy and bishops in supporting the archbishop of Aix.

When the train bearing the archbishop of Aix arrived in the station at the village of Aix to-day a multitude was assembled that evinced a most hostile disposition. Loud hisses were heard as the archbishop alighted, and the crowd made a rush as if about to seize him. He was rudely hustled, if not actually struck, and would have suffered more severely but for the police, who managed with considerable force to disperse the unfriendly concourse.

Fired Barns and Residences.

Centralia, Ill., Dec. 1.—James T. McKibben and two other men named Stacey and Lordon have been arrested at Santoval for arson. During the past year a number of barns and residences have been fired, and the work has been traced to the men under arrest, with McKibben as leader. Stacey and Lordon have made confessions, in which they say that other burnings were planned, and that arrangements were made for the assassination of several people. McKibben is well known in this state and in South Dakota. He was state business agent for the Farmers' Mutual Benefit association for two years, was state organizer for the Farmers' Alliance In Dakota, was the founder and editor of the Brotherhood of Labor, also associate editor on the Liberator, published at Springfield.

Insanity or Hypnotism.

Fargo, N. D., Special Telegram Dec. 1.—The district court will open to-morrow, and one of the first cases will be the trial of W. C. Remington for the murder of Agent J. C. Flett at Arthur last winter. It is not known what the defense will be, as the attorney refuses to state. It will probably be either hypnotism or insanity. Attorney General Spencer will assist State's Attorney Rose in the prosecution of the case. To-morrow will probably be occupied in securing a jury. The murder was one of the most cold-blooded affairs ever committed in the state.

Postal Affairs.

Washington, Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—Postmasters appointed to-day: North Dakota—J. W. Elliott; Conkling, McLean county. South Dakota—J. W. Nesbitt, Cortlandt, Edmunds county; J. Groub, Longland, Buffalo county; P. J. Markrud, Lounsberry, Day county; E. H. White, Phinney, Custer county. John Hunter, postmaster at Maple Bay, Polk county, Minn., has gone to the soldiers' home, and his wife is recommended for the office. John J. Hanson, postmaster at Ibsen, Murray county, has resigned.

A Forgery Detected.

Eau Claire, Wis., Special Telegram, Dec. 1.—An unknown man attempted to pass at a clothing store to-day a check for $28, purporting to have been issued by the Northwestern Lumber company. Payment was refused and it is found that the check was forged. The man has eluded arrest thus far. The name on the check was Adelbert Smith.

A Madman's Crime.

McMinneville, Or., Dec. 1.—J. H. Stine, editor of the Whiteson Advance, was shot and killed last night by N. C. Cook, a railroad section boss. Cook then blew his own brains out. The men were friends and were walking along the road together when Cook suddenly drew a revolver and shot Stine in the back of the neck. Cook had been acting strangely of late. It is supposed that he was seized with a fit of mental aberration. Both men were members of the G. A. R.

Ex-President Cleveland, accompanied by Mrs. Cleveland and baby Ruth, left New York yesterday for a New Jersey winter resort. The period of their absence is not known.

Professor of Athletics.

Springfield, Mass., Dec. 1.—A. A. Stagg, Yale's famous athlete graduate, who is still a member of the Y. M. C. A. training school here, has returned from his vacation and admits that the rumor of an offer to become a member of the Yale faculty is true. He says he made President Harper, of the Chicago university, a verbal promise that he would take the professorship in physical culture when the institution opens in 1892. The Yale offer appeals to him, however, and it is thought Mr. Stagg will ask for release from his Chicago engagement.

Register Locken—It is a significant fact that there are mortgages being satisfied and fewer new ones being recorded this fall than ever before in the history of the office. Heretofore the chief income of the office was the fees for recording real estate mortgages, a regular bonafide transfer was a rarity. This has been reversed during the past year. Now the principal business is recording warrantee deeds, and our income from the mortgages put on record is hardly enough to keep a prohibitionist in whiskey.—Crookston Times:

Anoka Union: The sooner the United States drives from her boundary line all anarchists, the better it will be for the country. In Chicago last Wednesday over a thousand gathered in a building to commemorate the hanging of their fellow anarchists Nov. 11th 1887. Red emblems covered everything, and the police entered and made them hang the stars and stripes amidst threats of vengence and cries of rage. Chicago should see to it that no more meetings of this kind are held and should arrest every one taking part and then try them for treason, convict them and hang every last one of them,

H. T. Oxnard, the beet sugar king, has three factories, two in Nebraska and one in California, which will produce 9,000,000 pounds of granulated sugar this year. But it will take 1,000 factories like that at Grand Island Neb, to supply this country in 1900. We use 4,0,0,000,000 pounds now and import nearly all of it, Whether we shall become a great beet sugar country or not depends upon the results of the experiments making in the west and northwest with sugar beet culture. It is probable that the area suitable for sugar beet production will be considerably narrowed down.—Journal.

New York Herald: "I noticed a short time ago" said a Washington official "that some objection was made by a Mr. Pell, of the San Domingo Short Line road, to the opening of a private letter by the chief of the secret service bureau. It is not generally known that the rules of the post office department empower inspectors to open suspicious letters at discretion. The public appear to be very much astonished at this proceeding mentioned, but I assure you that it is carried to a greater extent than even those who know all about it suppose. In fact, under the rules of the postoffice department almost any private letter can be opened and read. This will surprise some people I presume, but it is never the less true, and a reference to the private instructions to postoffice inspectors, which are in printed forms, will convince anybody of it. Whether such secret privileges are ever used illegitimately would be difficult to find out. It is a good deal like arresting a man on suspicion. As a matter of fact therefore, you will see that the United States mails are no more sacred than the mails of Russia or any other country so far as government espionage is concerned."

An unpublished chapter of diplomatic history is given to the world in recent Washington dispatches. It seems that when Baron Fava, the Italian Minister to the United States, was withdrawn on account of the affair at New Orleans, our state department did not recall our ambassador to Rome, but instead sent him instructions to spend the summer outside of Italy. He thereupon went to Scotland and enjoyed a pleasant vacation. Recently Baron Fava received a promotion from his government, which signifies that he will not return to Washington and it does not appear that Italy intends to send any other representative to this country. Accordingly Mr. Proctor has been summoned to return to the United States, ostensively on leave, but with a tacit understanding that he will not resume his diplomatic duties so long as Italy remains unrepresented at Washington.

The village council is having the following advertisement published in the Mississippi Valley Lumberman:

A BIG OPENING FOR A SAW MILL FIRM,

The Village of St. Hilaire, Polk County Minn., will offer inducements to the right kind of a saw mill firm to locate there. St. Hilaire is situated in the northeastern part of Polk Co. on the Great Northern railway and on the Red Lake reservation: This reservation is now being surveyed and pine can be purchased next year. It is estimated to contain two billion feet of the finest pine in Minnesota. Logs can be secured this winter from the Indians who will cut several million feet. St. Hilaire is located in a fine farming district, markets over 350,000 bushels of wheat and the demand for lumber is large. The townsite company will give to the right kind of a firm, twenty acres of land on the river convenient to the business part of town, and free shore rights and good boomage for two hundred million feet of logs. The village council and citizens will add a very liberal bonus. Lumbermen who are figuring on the Red Lake Pine cannot afford to overlook this offer. Address all communications to

ARE THE CHARGES TRUE?

Crookston Times,

That railroad corporations should attempt to control the action of all the wheat buyers along their line so as to prevent any one from bidding above others and thus defeat the possibility of competition between buyers seems incredible for the reason that if any thing whatever could cause hostile legislation to the companies this undoubtedly would and justly so for if the companies arrogate to themselve the power to fix the price for all the buyers shipping over their roads and enforce their arrogance by refusing to furnish cars to any who pay more than the price dictated, then railroads are infact the offensive and oppressive monopolies that they have been charged with being. The farmers of Stearns county make complaint which if true, shows that the railroad companies are likely to receive at the hands of the next legislature a shaking up that will cause them to forever after keep their hands off the wheat market, and make them glad to be allowed to attend to their legitimate business of transportation. The Melrose Sun states the matter as follows:

"G. W. Peabody, from the general traffic office of the Great Northern railroad company has spent two days in this village the past week laboring hard to adjust the price of wheat at this market; and make the buyers conform strictly to the listed price, He goes so far in this matter as to say that if the buyers at this place presist in holding the price above the listed rates they will not be able to secure cars to carry their grain from their elevators to market, that the railroad company will refuse to give them the legitimate means of transportation."

OUT IN MONTANA.

I left here some weeks ago over the Great Northern, went through the Devils Lake country and thence to Great Falls, Mont., a town that I am much pleased with. I tell you great business is there. They are now erecting a bank building to cost $125,000. What makes the town? Its water power and mining interests. A smelter is here which has already cost $500,000 and will cost $3,000,000 to complete. From Great Falls I went to Armington in the Neihart and Barker mining country; thence by stage to Lewiston the county seat and thence to Maiden, a mining camp. Here I stayed two weeks and inspected the mining interests. I am much pleased with the prospects. The mines produce silver, gold lead, etc. There is a great chance to make money in mining property and real estate in all those places.—S. O. Hinsdale in Fergus Falls (Minn.) Journal.

THE VALE OF ROSES.

Somewhere hid in lands of sun,
Lies the Vale of Roses;
Where of golden seasons spun,
The golden year uncloses.
Between the rose flushed peaks and skies,
The hidden valley hidden lies,
And happy he whose mortal eyes
Shall see the Vale of Roses.

Seaward from the mountains high,
Slopes the Vale of Roses;
Lazy sails go drifting by
Where the vista closes.
Never stormy wind may roar
'Round the placid lower shore—
Silence reigns for evermore
In the Vale of Roses.

Long dim aisles of roses shine
Up the Vale of Roses;
Scarlet flowers load the vine,
Where the palm reposes.
Oft the Persian minstrel flings
Wilder music on his strings,
As upon the plains he sings
Of the Vale of Roses.

Sweet the story is to hear
Of the Vale of Roses;
But the heart that holds it dear
On its secret closes.
Not to eastern lands alone
Is the fabled valley known—
Every clime has for its own
Some fair Vale of Roses.

Heights that lie just out of reach—
These are Vales of Roses;
Longing never set in speech
In each heart reposes.
Every soul its vale has sought,
Glimpses of its beauty caught,
And is nobler for the thought
Of the Vale of Roses.

Meerschaum Pipes, Violins and Poems.

Certain things are good for nothing until they have been kept a long while, and some are good for nothing until they have been long kept and used. Of the first wine is the illustrious and immortal example. Of those that must be kept and used I will name three—meerschaum pipes, violins and poems. The meerschaum is but a poor affair until it has burned a thousand offerings to the cloud compelling deities.

Violins, too—the sweet old Amati!—the divine Stradivarius! Stained, like the meerschaum, through and through with the concentrated hue and sweetness of all the harmonies which have kindled and faded on its strings.

Now, I tell you, a poem must be kept and used like a meerschaum or a violin. A poem is just as porous as the meerschaum: the more porous it is the better I mean to say that a genuine poem is capable of absorbing an indefinite amount of the essence of our own humanity, its tenderness, its heroism, its regrets, its aspirations, so as to be gradually stained through with a divine secondary color derived from ourselves.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

A Water Curist.

My firm belief is that the use of drugs is very detrimental in at least nine cases of sickness out of every ten. The patient would improve more rapidly on plain diet—such as gruel, stale bread, graham mush and a liberal amount of vegetables than meats and fruits. Also bathe frequently, especially in warm weather, so the pores may be kept open. Medicine will make a well man sick and will kill the other half of the half dead sick men. Be temperate in all things and give nature a chance to perform her duty

Recently I was taken with a severe chill. I only "shook" fifteen minutes, and I shook in a hurry too. My only remedy was hot water. I drank two cupfuls, took a hot foot bath, covered up in bed. "The perspiration did roll. Oh, my!" The next morning I ate a light breakfast and went to work, feeling perfectly well. I am a "water cure crank" myself and I have every reason to be.

All manner of diseases can be cured by the simple use of water in various ways, smallpox and cholera not excepted.—Cor. St. Louis Republic.

How She Expressed It.

A veritable Mrs. Malaprop was encountered in a Brooklyn street car the other day As the car neared the park her companion wondered what a large, evidently public, building seen in the distance was. "That," was the prompt reply, "is the Incurable Home for Women." Later the same woman was seated on a bench in the park when a dog following a young man along the path stopped and sniffed about near her. "Oh, call your dog," she cried in some alarm, "he's too official."

Evidently the woman was like the home.—New York Times.

A Pleasing Illusion.

Because they were more durable Mrs. Calliper had bought table knives with metal handles. She almost feared that Colonel Calliper might not like them, but the Colonel seemed rather to be pleased with them. "They are," he said, "just such knives as I have eaten with in many restaurants. To eat here at home and with a knife like this is almost as good as eating two meals at once."—New York Sun.

Raising Lobsters Artificially.

The decrease of the natural supply of lobsters has compelled scientific men to investigate their habits. Experiments, so far as they have been pursued, indicate that lobsters may be artificially reared for the market, but that they must be hatched and produced on a large scale to make the enterprise remunerative.—New York Herald.

A Big Bed of Coal Aglow.

There is a mountain of coal in Wild Horse valley, Wyoming, which has been burning for more than thirty years. It sends up dense volumes of smoke, and at times the gas from it is almost suffocating, even at a distance of fifty to seventy-five miles from the burning coal bed.—St. Louis Republic.

An author in a manual on horsemanship has succeeded in putting into print the peculiar cluck used in starting horses, which is made by thrusting the tongue against the roof of the mouth. He spells it "Klk."

Dr. George Turner states that a cat fed with the refuse food of some children sick with diphtheria also suffered severely with what seemed to be the same disease.

MONKEY ACTORS.

A Trainer Must Become a Monkey to Be Able to Teach Them Tricks.

The training of monkeys for stage performances demands peculiar talents and a curious psychological ability on the part of the instructor. Brockmann probably the most successful monkey trainer that the world has seen, once described thus the necessary method of approaching a monkey pupil:

"To the monkey man is a strange and incomprehensible being. I therefore must adopt as far as possible the monkey's way of regarding persons and things. The monkey must find in me one of his own kind—a monkey like himself, only a much stronger monkey, whom he must obey. Then he has something which he can understand; he accustoms himself to it, and he voluntarily takes more pains to comprehend me than he would take to comprehend a being who made on him about the same impression that a monster from another world would make on us. I adapt, therefore, all to his mode of life. When he disobeys and rebels against me I do not strike, because he does not strike; but I bite because he bites." "

The behavior of a troop of monkeys trained by Brockmann would undoubtedly strengthen the convictions of the Russian Duroff, who gave up teaching in a high school to instruct pigs and geese, and who holds that, of all pupils, human pupils are the least docile. A man once behind the scenes of Brockmann's monkey theater wrote:

"I have always regretted that Brockmann did not give his performances on a perfectly open stage, so that the audience could see the waiting performers. The conduct of the quadruped actors while awaiting their parts was much more fascinating than their best acting before the audience. Like a company of gnomes or lilliputians the little performers sit there dressed and made up, perfectly well behaved, each in the proper human attitude on his tiny chair, each following with undivided attention and eager anxiety the progress of the play so as to be ready at the exact moment for his appearance. No person is near them, no servant or attendant to distract them; and no prompter to whisper at the proper time:

"'Fraulein Lehmann, look out! You come on immediately;' or, 'Herr Schulze! Where is Herr Schulze? Quick! Quick! You must go on.'

"Every one knows his part perfectly. Every one is acquainted with the progress of the plot and with the stage of the development at which he is expected to appear. Without a catchword or motion he hurries down from his tiny chair and out on the stage, plays his little part, and without a bow for the approval of the audience turns back to his place, not to leave it before duty calls him again, before the footlights. Here all alone and unwatched these little fellows never forget their roles so far as to settle down on all fours, cower in monkey fashion, or indulge in the pranks of their mercurial natures."—New York Sun.

Lively Fly Paper.

Unfortunately we are all familiar with the sticky fly paper, which, despite its nastiness and horrible appearance when covered with its victims, holds its own purely by its undoubted efficacy in riding a room of these most annoying pests. One household's experiences with this very heroic remedy were most amusing. "Good gracious! what is the matter with that paper?" said "Auntie," jumping up suddenly from her chair as the family were seated at luncheon and pointing to a piece of fly paper that was circling wildly around in the middle of the room, apparently blowing this way and that in the most lively breeze, there being not a particle of wind stirring.

A dash at the lively sheet on the part of one of the children explained the mystery—underneath it and quite concealed by its size was a tiny Maltese kitten, who was too astonished at her predicament even to mew; but her protestations were loud and vehement when they tried to pull off the firmly attached fly paper, and her situation for a day or two was most uncomfortable despite her repeated cleanings, as she stuck to the floor whenever she went to sleep and had to be "unglued" every time.—New York Tribune.

The Sunday Breakfast.

Among the many practical methods devised by kindly Christian people to reach and help the poor and criminal classes, one of the most effective is the Sunday breakfast in Philadelphia.

At 9 o'clock every Sunday morning a room is opened in one of the most degraded quarters of the city within easy reach of sailors, emigrants and that unnumbered class who are homeless and hungry

The room is clean and warm, a pleasant refuge in stormy weather. The table is set, and each man or woman who enters, no matter how filthy or degraded, is heartily welcomed. The breakfast consists of two substantial sandwiches and a cup of strong hot coffee.

After the meal is over there is music, and one or two hymns are sung, while the hosts—men and women of all sects—go quietly about among their guests and try to find out the special misery in their lives, and to make them their friends.—Youth's Companion.

How Egyptian Women Paint.

Loret says the ancient Egyptian women had blue hair, green eyelashes, painted teeth and reddened cheeks. He says the modern Egyptian women are much the same; they tinge their hands with henna, and prolong the eyes by means of kohol; they stain the nails brown and paint blue stars on the chin and forehead. "One hesitates a little about putting his hand into a hand—even very small—which extends itself to you painted a brick red. One is a little timid about looking too long into eyes—even very tender—when the blue star between them makes you squint." Loret, however, got bravely over his hesitation and his timidity, and thinks the fashion not altogether bad.—Popular Science Monthly.

A cow near Thompson, Ga., that got her tail caught somehow in a tree, made trouble worse by going around the trunk until she wound up like a clock. She then became frightened, and giving a lunge pulled the tail out by the roots. Afterward the tail was found as described by the animal's owner.

A Cincinnati rat, desiring comfortable quarters, utterly regardless of expense, fashioned its nest out of $525 worth of greenbacks which it found in a drawer. The owner of the greenbacks has confiscated the nest, and shows it to her visitors.

WANTED--A BURGLAR.

THE STRANGE STORY OF A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.

BY J. WEBSTER BAYNES.

The advertisement was copied and commented upon by the provincial press throughout the kingdom. Many looked upon it as a silly hoax or a police dodge, but it was neither one nor the other. The clerks in the office of the Morning News were naturally inquisitive. A boy had brought the advertisement in a sealed envelope, paid for it, and taken away the regulation slip of paper marked "B 148." Three insertions had been paid for. There was much discussion in the office as to whether there would be any reply, and not a few small bets had been made upon it. A week went by, but though no one came with slip "B 148," four letters addressed to that initial and number had been received. On the tenth day, however, a quiet, pale-faced little woman, with great brown eyes, small but firm lips, dark auburn hair, and regular features, walked up to the desk of the head clerk in the "Reply to advertisement" office, and asked if there were any letters for "B 148," at the same time showing the slip of paper authorizing her to collect same. The clerk looked at her inquisitively. She was well dressed, very lady-like, and if not handsome had something more than an ordinarily good-looking face. "B 148?" He would see if there were any replies to such a number; and on his way to the pigeon hole "B" he told his fellow-clerks that the burglar advertisement was being inquired for, and by a lady, with the result that many curious glances were directed toward the little lady, who, however, received her letters and left the office as composedly as she entered it.

As she stepped into the street she hailed a 'bus for the Bank; arrived at which centre she proceeded on foot by Princess-street, Moorgate-street, and London Wall to Hounds-ditch, stopping at intervals as though to see if she was followed. Apparently satisfied that this was not the case, she made her way by various cross-cuts to Cannon-street, where she entered one of those large blocks of offices which resemble huge rabbit warrens rather than the haunts of business men, and, after threading its labyrinthian passages for a few moments, she emerged into a quiet side street, where a four-wheeled cab was waiting. Simply uttering the word "Home" she seated herself well back in the conveyance, as though to escape observation, and after an hour's jolting drive was set down before a dull-looking house in a sleepy square in Clerkenwell, which she entered by the aid of a latchkey.

Ascending the broad stairs leading from the entrance hall, she passed into a well-furnished bedroom with dressing room attached, in which a cheerful fire was burning. Removing her wraps, she seated herself before the fire and leisurely examined the envelopes addressed to "B 148." After a few moment's study, she opened one, the writing on which showed evidence of an attempt to disguise the natural hand. It read as follows:—

If "B 148" wants something special in the way of a burglar, and requires proof of ability, please send address to XYZ, care of H. Walker, 19, Little Larkstreet, Boro'. Premises entered and effects cleared on the shortest notice, if guarantee given that no prosecution will follow. An early reply will oblige—XYZ.

With a muttered exclamation—"A shallow hoax"—this missive was consigned to the fire. No. 2 was of a very different stamp. The handwriting was worse than bad, the orthography worse than the writing, whilst blots and smudges occupied the lion's share of the rough sheet of paper on which it was written. It ran as follows:—

If "B 148 is skware ime is man. ime a purfeshnal, as can krak any krib. Served time, but ave now a tiknt, bein on the strate lay at presant. J. the T.

After perusing this precious document twice, so as to get at its full meaning, the reader placed it on the table at her side, with the brief comment, "Dangerous," and then proceeded to open No. 3, of which the following is a copy:—

If "B 148" will state for what purpose a clever burglar is wanted, writer might be able to find such a person. Reply to C. R. K., Stone's Coffee-house, Mole-street, Whitechapel.

This was placed on the table along with Jemmy the Twist's effusion, and the fourth epistle was opened. The contents were brief and to the point, and were as follows:—

If "B 148" really means business, writer will be glad to enter into communication. Letter addressed to J. L., and handed to the old crossing sweeper, corner of Milton Square and Beach street, Clerkenwell, will at once be attended to.

After carefully re-reading this last epistle, and closely examining the handwriting, the lady, with a decisive exclamation, "I'll try it," rose, and procuring writing materials, penned the following reply:—

Will "J. L." make an appointment as early as possible with "B 148," through same medium as this reaches him. Answer shall be called for tomorrow, January 15th, at 10 o'clock a. m.

Having sealed and placed the initials "J. L." on the envelope, the writer rang the bell, and in response to the summons an elderly woman appeared, who looked anywhere from 50 to 70, was stern of visage, quiet in manner, and typical of that class of widows who have seen better days and dwell upon the noble character of "the late lamented," who in life have known more of the rough than the smooth side of their tongues.

"Well, m'm," she queried resignedly.

"Will you send Tom to me, Mrs. Jenks," was the answer. "I've an errand I would like him to go; that is, of course, if he's not engaged."

"Well, m'm he's not engaged specially; that is, he's not doing anything particklar; he's only throwin' bricks at the sparers in the back yard. Would you want him cleaned up, m'm?" replied the widow, who evidently was in some awe of her tenant.

"Oh, no, Mrs. Jenks; just send him up as he is. I wont keep him long away, and I daresay he will be as pleased to do something for me as to torment the sparrows."

With this answer Mrs Jenks retired, and shortly there appeared at the door a small boy with an open, countrified-looking face, who bore no resemblance to his mother, being yellow-haired and freckled, and to all appearance the very essence of openness and candor. But there was a look in his eye which at times belied his character, and which perhaps might account for the name by which he was familiarly known in the neighborhood, viz. that of "The Imp." His clothes were too large for a boy of his size, but somehow the idea seemed to grow upon any one who watched him for a time that if he was physically too small for them he was mentally too big. The vacuity of his countenance, after a short study, only added to the notion that somehow his face, body, and clothing were only a disguise to his mind. To put it shortly, Tommy Jenks was what is commonly called "all there;" though he did not look it at the first glance, by a great deal. Having come into the presence of the lady, of whom he stood in great awe, Tom duly received the letter for "J. L.," and along with it precise directions for its delivery, and promise of good reward if he carried out instructions discreetly. With a knowing nod of the head, which meant volumes had it been interpreted, the boy left the room, and descending the stairs by sliding down the banisters; he was met at the bottom by his mother, who, after boxing his ears for thus endangering his neck, asked him where and upon what message he was going: for Mrs. Jenks, looks notwithstanding, possessed all the inquisitiveness of her sex.

"To the post with a letter," said the boy, dodging past her and out the side door; "and it ain't a lie, either," he muttered to himself, "for old broomstick's as deaf as a post so I'm taking it to a post.

Satisfying himself with which piece of logic, Jenks leaned his back against some area railings and proceeded to examine the envelope he had just received. It was a plain square one, its creamy whiteness only varied by the neatly written initials, "J. L." in the corner. The boy turned it over and over, held it up to the light smelt it as boys will, and then said solemnly. "'The Countess is mashed on a crossing sweeper, s'help me; there's a rival in the field;" saying which he resumed his walk, but at a slower pace.

Tom Jenks called the lady who occupied the greater portion of his mother's house, "The Countess," because he said she looked like the Countess Caramel, the heroine of a very dreadful "penny dreadful" called "The Crimes of Castle Curdle," which was a standard work with him. The idea of "The Countess" being mashed on a crossing sweeper seemed to disturb him greatly. He approached the corner of Beach-street warily, inspecting the old man, whose broom kept such a clean strip of roadway in all weathers, from a distance; in fact, he stalked him, as he called it, approaching him from first one direction and then another, as though he were an enemy. At length he made a dash, appearing so suddenly before the sweeper as to startle him. Satisfied with the effect his appearance had caused, he drew himself up to his full height and said mysteriously, "I'm from "The Countess,'"

The old man stared vacantly for a moment or two, then grasping the handle of his broom threateningly, he said, "What's that you say, impidence? What are you up to now, eh?"

"I've a letter from 'The Countess," replied Tom, still keeping up his air of mystery, but sliding out of reach of the broom,

"What do you mean with your 'Countess,' you young rascal? If you've a letter for any-body say so, and let's have it without any of your story-book nonsense."

The boy, a little taken down by this matter-of-fact speech, forthwith produced the letter and handed it to the old man, who examined it slowly. "Do you know, 'J. L.,'" broke in "The Imp," with a cunning look.

"Well, I might and I might not," was the reply; "but who sent you with this, eh! Do you know who it's from," he continued, as the boy hesitated for an instant.

"I might and I might not," was the answer given, as the speaker dodged well out of harm's reach; "that's enough for you, old besom-stale," he added, as he reached the pavement. "But you just see that 'ere dokiment right, or you'll cop it from 'The Countess," mind, I'm telling you." With which threat and sundry contemptuous gesticulations and facial contortions commonly indulged in by rude little boys when satisfied of their bodily safety, Tommy Jenks turned homewards.

The relieving of his feelings in this lavish manner caused some trepidation on the morrow, however, when the writer of the note asked him to call at 10 o'clock for a reply. He could not refuse very well, though he would liked to have done so, but the promise of a shilling upon his return was much too tempting an offer to be missed, so he started out with such courage as he could summon up. Arrived at the corner of Beach-street, he found the crossing sweeper busy in the middle of the road; it having been a wet night. After a moment's consideration, he opened communication with a shrill "I say, mister, have you got a letter?" The old man raised his head at the cry, but seeing who it was, he went on with his work without further notice. This made the Imp's spirits sink. But the chance of earning the shilling emboldened him, and approaching as near as safety would permit, he repeated his question in a more respectful tone of voice. This time the sweeper answered him, "Yes, yer young reprobate, I've a letter and a thrashing for yer, for yer imperence, and when you've had one yer can have t'other, but it's thrashing fust, mind yer."

This was unpleasant news for Master Jenks, and the shilling already looked considerably discounted. He tried argument, wheedling, and entreaty, but without effect; then he threatened the vengeance of "The Countess," and various other people with high sounding names, but who existed only in his imagination, still without moving the crossing sweeper, who went on with his labor without taking much notice of him. Tommy was in despair, but his difficulty was very abruptly resolved to his great discomfiture, for the old man, watching his opportunity, suddenly grabbed the boy by the collar, and forthwith commenced to pay off a long score of insult and contumely which the Imp had run up in times past. Struggles and tears were in vain, and it was not until he had received a sound drubbing that he was released.

"Now then," said his chastiser, as he gave him a final shake, "just you stop them 'ere little games of yours; for if yer start 'em again, and I catch yer, I'll about kill yer. There's yer letter, take it right off, and don't yer lose it; now cut."

Tommy was very glad to "cut" without further parley, but when a safe distance, he could not refrain from sending a parting shot at his enemy. "Yah, yer didn't hurt me a bit, old besom-stale;" but his flushed face and tearful eyes belied his words. Later on, though, when he was enjoying the proceeds of his labor, to wit, his promised fee, he explained to a bosom companion that he would take a licking like that every morning, provided he was sure of a "bob" after it. Meantime, the letter which had cost Tommy Jenks so much pain to procure had been opened and read. It was to the following effect:—

"J. L." will be glad to meet "B 148" this afternoon at 3:30, opposite the "Angel" at Islington. "J. L." will wear a grey deerstalker hat, and carry a white handkerchief in left hand. Will "B 148" also carry handkerchief in same hand? 3:30 sharp.

About five minutes before the time appointed the lady known by the Imp as "The Countess" stepped out of a Highgate tram at the Angel corner, and as she did so, almost the first personage she noticed was a tall, broad-shouldered young man apparently about 28 years of age, with curly hair, a clear healthy complexion, and large strong hands, which had evidently been used to work. He was dressed in a dark grey tweed suit, and wore a grey deerstalker. At the moment she saw him he was knocking the ashes out of a briar pipe, which done, he placed it in his pocket, and drawing forth a white handkerchief he held it lightly in his left hand. The lady, after studying his features for a few seconds, took her handkerchief from her reticule, and stepping up to him; she touched his arm, and said quietly, "Is this 'J. L.' might I ask?"

"It is," he answered, looking down with puzzled surprise at the speaker, and then coloring deeply, and confusedly lifting his hat, he said, "Can this be 'B 148.'"

"Yes, I am 'B 148,'" was the reply. I cannot very well say what I want to do in the street, and as I know of no place so convenient as where I am staying, would you mind following me there? You have nothing to fear. It is in a respectable neighborhood. You will see no one but myself, as no one has any knowledge whatever of the business I wish to discuss. Will you come?"

"Madame," he replied, "I trust you. I have no fear; lead on, and I will follow you at a distance."

The lady merely answered with a low bow, and started at a brisk pace toward her house, her new acquaintance following about twenty yards in the rear. Arrived at Mrs. Jenks's the lady let herself in, and closing the door behind her, waited until she heard the young man's foot steps, when she admitted him, and conducting him upstairs, she ushered him into a small but nicely furnished sitting room. Pointing to a chair, she removed her bonnet and gloves, and seated herself on a low ottoman, with her back to the light, in which position she commanded a good view of his features.

ALL GUM-CHEWERS UGLY.

If Not so by Nature They Become so by Practice of the Vulgarism.

The inquiry that has often been made, and never satisfactorily answered is: Why, says the Chicago Herald, is it that a beautiful woman is rarely found addicted to the gum-chewing habit? If she is, she certainly never makes an exhibition of it in public places. It may be that she realizes the fact that the process of mastication does not enhance the attractiveness of the human face, hence has the good sense to take no chances of disfigurement.

Any one who will take the trouble to observe will note that the gum-chewer is invariably homely enough to stop a street car without pulling the bell. The same rule holds good in every public place where the gum-chewing woman is met.

Physicians have condemned the habit as physically hurtful, but this has had no effect in restraining the jaws of the gum fiend. Perhaps, however, the opinion very boldly expressed on State street may have a more efficacious effect. A couple of gentlemen were conversing in front of Buck & Rayner's when a well-dressed girl came tripping by.

"What a pity that every ugly woman who chews gum cannot be stricken with lockjaw!"

"Did you ever see a handsome woman chewing gum?"

"Come to think, I never did."

"How do you account for it?"

"I don't account for it; I only repeat the fact."

This was a sidewalk opinion as to at least one unfortunately homely gum-chewer.

Making an Impression.

The girl is unlucky who finds out suddenly that she has something nice the matter with her. I knew one who learned that she had lovely hair. She took to doing it up with one hairpin, and she used to look like a mop on the third day of a house cleaning. She took to jerking her head, too, so that the hair would come down, and then she did look lovely, especially if it happened at the theater, at luncheon or in the cars. She would waggle her head so that her words would come out scalloped, and her nose got all spread around. A girl with a neat foot is the worst nuisance I know. She always has it stuck out in the car. Her shoestring is always coming undone. She is forever lifting her dress up and making you nervous. It just about spoils a girl if she finds out that she has fine eyes and pretty teeth. Good-by to quiet expression at once. Her eyes roll, droop, snap, shut, open, dance and sparkle, all over the place. till you wonder why they don't get sprained. Meanwhile her teeth are working just as hard. She smiles twice a minute and often her eyes are getting in some fine touches that don't go with a smile at all. I got so tired looking at a girl the other day that I wondered why the man with her didn't marry her just for the sake of tying her eyes to her nose and knocking her teeth out. As for me, give me a girl who knows she is homely, or one who is so good looking that she doesn't care.—Philadelphia Press.

AN INDIGESTIBLE NOTE.

How the Israelite Collected His Note.

A Prussian army officer, stationed at Berlin, frequently had occasion to borrow money from an accomodating Israelitish friend, who only charged three or four per cent. a month. As a general thing, the officer, Baron Von Pump, was able to meet his obligations, but on the occasion to which we allude he was not in a position to do so.

Moses Levy was promptly on hand to collect the money. He called on the Baron Von Pump in his room and presented the note.

"Moses, I have heretofore been able to meet my notes, but I have no money to pay this one. You will have to wait."

"I don't vait at all. Ven you don't pay dot note right avay, I goes and prings dot note a shustus of der peace pefore, and sues you on der spot!"

Baron von Pump quietly locked the door and put the key into his pocket, whereupon Moses' legs began to wobble about, and his eyes to protude with anxiety, for he was afraid of personal violence at the hands of his creditor.

The baron produced a pistol, and focussed the unhappy Israelite.

"Now, Mr. Judas Iscariot, you take that note of mine and eat it."

"Scheneral, I vas shoost joking mit you; I can vait so long as you vant."

"I can take a joke as well as anybody, and now it is your turn to take a joke. Chew up that note and swallow it, or you are a dead man," said the officer, and he pressed lightly on the trigger.

In vain did Moses protest that he did not feel like eating, and that he was in no hurry for his money.

"Down with it!" thundered the officer.

Although Moses was in no danger of perishing for lack of food, he clearly perceived that he might prolong his life by the collation to which he was so cordially invited. He chewed up the note, principal and interest, and craning out his neck he managed to get it down.

"Now you can go and bring suit on that note if you like it. Perhaps the clerk of the court will put you on file if you tell him where the note is," said Baron von Pump.

A few days afterwards the baron received some money from home, with which he promptly paid Moses what was due to him.

"Scheneral, der next time ven you vants der monies, shust come to your old friend Moses Levy, who will never go back one you."

"All right Moses. Next time I need money I'll let you know."

Not long afterward Baron von Pump needed money and notified Moses to bring the desired amount to his room. Having counted over the money the officer took a sheet of paper and began to write out his note for the amount at ninety days.

"If you please, Scheneral put that right avay. I vould not have dot."

From under his coat he drew forth a huge cake of gingerbread, and held it towards the baron.

"Now you shust write dot note out on dot gingerbread; so ven I has to eat again I vill not suffer so mooch as I did ven I schwallowed dot oder note."

TEMPERAMENT OF GENIUS.

Something About the Peculiarities of Great Men.

An eminent litterateur, who, like other journalists, seems in the season of the big gooseberry—the season too, described by a leading publisher as the dullest on record—to suffer from lack of matter for his monthly gossip, has raised, apropos of Mrs. Ireland's new book, the old question of the celibacy of writing men. He says to the matrimonial virgin: "Don't marry a man of genius." So and on much the same grounds has the author of "Virginibus Puerisque" spoken. To quote him: "The practice of letters is miserably harrassing to the mind, and after an hour or two's work all the more human portion of the author is extinct; he will bully, backbite and speak daggers."

But the doctors differ. A day or two ago I was talking to one of the most eminent and also one of the busiest of our literary men. I asked him what portion of life he thought most enjoyable. "Those in which I am hard at work," he answered, without a moment's hesitation. "And does it not make you feel nervous and irritable?" was the next inquiry. "Not at all," he replied; "on the contrary, a spell of composition exhilerates me like the drinking of champagne. I never feel depressed or gloomy except when idle." One fancies that Sir Walter Scott did not make a bad husband, and he worked about as hard as most men. Depend upon it, the marriage of a literary men is as much of a lottery as any other wedding.—London Globe.

The Family of Tolstoi.

A Danish writer, who has visited Tolstoi at his country seat, gives some interesting particulars about the novelist's nine children, and their opinions. The eldest son aged 27, has taken the degree of doctor of philosophy, and has accepted an official appointment on the State Prisons board in order that he may avoid the appearance of too emphatically opposing his father's opinions, which he does not share. He is a musician and composer, inheriting an ardent love of music from his father. The next son, Ilija, is married and lives quietly on his estate in the province of Tula. The third believes more in his father's doctrines than any other of the family. The eldest daughter, Tatjana, is no adherent to her father's teachings. She is artistic and paints well. The second, Mascha, has chosen her father's mode of life. Dressed as a peasant girl, she labors; in the fields, and gives her leisure hours to working and caring for the poor. There are four younger children, the smallest of whom is 3 years old. Countess Tolstoi, notwithstanding the claims of this large family, finds time to attend to her husband's English correspondence. The count recieves letters in four or five different languages and always replies in that in which he is addressed. His daughters help to write the answers. The German letters are dealt with by a young gentleman of that nationality.

"August Flower"

Relieved in Two Days. Constipation Life of Misery

"I inherit some tendency to Dyspepsia from my mother. I suffered two years in this way; consulted a number of doctors. They did me no good. I then used your August Flower and it was just two days when I felt great relief. I soon got so that I could sleep and eat, and I felt that I was well. That was three years ago, and I am still first-class. I am never without a bottle, and if I feel constipated the least particle a dose or two of August Flower does the work. The beauty of the medicine is, that you can stop the use of it without any bad effects on the system. While I was sick I felt everything it seemed to me a man could feel. I was of all men most miserable. I can say, in conclusion, that I believe August Flower will cure anyone of indigestion, if taken with judgment. A. M. Weed, 229 Bellefontaine St., Indianapolis, Ind."

Beecher Was Often Afraid.

To one always ready to give so much zeal and courage to any cause which claimed his special service, it was singular to note how distrustful Mr. Beecher was of his ability to succeed, writes Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher in the memoirs of her husband in the December Ladies' Home Journal. In his earlier work, this lack of confidence in himself was sometimes painful until he rose to speak. But generally the moment he stepped upon the platform all thoughts of himself disappeared.

Many times when going to speak on a subject of special interest which I greatly desired to hear, he would say,

"Oh! don't go! I am sure I am going to fail and I don't want you to be present." For several years I yielded to such a request, and anxious and troubled lest he should fail, waited his return. But he invaribly came home cheerful, and would say,

"I had great liberty; now I wish you had gone. The audience appeared greatly interested and very appreciative. They gave me great comfort and courage." and he would appear happy and surprised. As I came to understand his moods better, I no longer feared any failure.

Dangers in the Athletic Lung.

"Athletic lung" is a medical term used to designate the abnormal development of lung possessed by some athletes. The condition is produced by those forms of exercise that call for the constant use of the lungs at their highest power. The result is an enormous development of lung capacity. Such men, upon giving up their active athletics and taking to sedentary pursuits, are peculiarly subject to pulmonary complaints. The overdeveloped lung is only used in part, and the unused cells easily fall a prey to disease when once an athletic lung has been restored to health. The wise physician forbids any violent athletics on the part of the patient, for a second attack is likely to be followed by collapse. The term athletic heart is applied to a similiar condition of the heart produced by like causes.

"A YARD OF ROSES."

One of the popular paintings at the New York Academy of Design was a yard-long panel of Roses. A crowd was always before it. One art critic exclaimed, "Such a bit of nature should belong to all the people, it is too beautiful for one man to hide away."

The Youth's Companion, of Boston, seized the idea, and spent twenty thousand dollars to reproduce the painting. The result has been a triumph of artistic delicacy and color.

The Companion makes an Autumn gift of this copy of the painting to each of its five hundred thousand subscribers. Any others who may subscribe now for the first time, and request it, will receive "The Yard of Roses," without extra charge while the edition lasts.

Two Things

In Regard to Catarrh

1st, It is a Constitutional Disease; and 2d, It Requires a Constitutional Remedy.

These two facts are now so well known to the medical fraternity, that local applications, like snuffs and inhalations, are regarded as at best likely to give only temporary relief. To effect a permanent cure of catarrh requires a constitutional remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which by purifying the blood, repairing the diseased tissues, and imparting healthy tone to the affected organs, does give thorough and lasting cure.

Novel Nickel-in-the-Slot Scheme

There is a gentleman in Hartford Conn., who has a novel scheme in relation to the liquor traffic. He would place the liquor traffic wholly in the hands of the government and abolish the saloon and instead have a suitable number of places in the cities and towns where drink could be obtained on the "nickle in-the-slot" plan. The places should be public in every sense of the word, opening from and in plain view of passers on the street. I would have it so arranged that a customer would have to pass through a turnstile to get to the fountain and another to leave it. The space inside the turnstile should be large enough for one person at a time. The plan of operation would be as follows: To obtain a drink one would pass through the turnstile which would lock after making a quarter turn, drop a coin in the slot corresponding with the kind of beverage he wished, and receive a bottle containing a drink which he could mix with water to suit his taste, and after he had drank it, deposite the bottle in another slot which would operate suitable mechanicism to unlock the turnstile for egress, and in leaving, the moving of the turnstile would unlock the one for entrance ready for the next customer. There should be in attendance a cashier to change money to the coin for use and a policeman to prevent minors and intoxicated persons from obtaining a drink.—Hartford Post.

More Classical Than Sensitive

One of the chief competitors at the Chancery Bar of Mr. Richard Bethell, Q.C., afterwards Lord Chancellor Westbury, was Mr. John Rolt, Q.C. who was subsequently one of the Lord Justices, and who was considered an equally able lawyer but had not received so brilliant a classical training.

If a word was pronounced, as he thought, wrongly in his hearing Bethell would be greatly irritated, as the following unreported story bears witness.

The defence set up on one occasion in an action by Mr. Rolt was that the plaintiff, for whom Mr. Bethell appeared, had been too dilatory in coming to the Court for relief, and consequently Mr. Rolt in his address several times mentioned the word which is the legal equivalent of dilatoriness, viz., "laches" pronouncing the a as in the word action.

Bethell winced each time that word was so uttered, and at length getting wild, he said in an audible whisper, and in his peculiar deliberate manner, "Mr. Rolt, I really should feel very grateful to you if you would say laches" as in acre.

Rolt replied that Bethell was too sensitive. Whereupon the latter, astonished that anyone should think him a sensitive man, rejoined, "No, Mr. Rolt, no. I do assure you that I am more classical than sensitive,"

Value of Watches.

Some old watches have considerable value and some have very little. In the first category are watches with hog's bristles for regulating the vibrations, egg watches, all watches with one hand, with or without ornamentations; watches without balance spring and without regulating arrangements, those with perforated cases those with finely chased cases, if the chasing be distinct; enameled gold watches of fine workmanship, watches of wood or ivory or with iron or porcelain cases, and nearly all watches with peculiar movements. Old watches of little value are those that have chased cases, the figures of which are worn off, or, if well preserved, are of inferior workmanship; painted pinchbeck cases, cases of four-colored gold layers with ordinary designs, and painted dials that display poor workmanship. Watches with figures striking on bells are of little value.—New York Sun.

In the Wilderness.

Jim was an invalid when he came out, and still professed to be dieting himself with great strictness under a set of rules laid down by his medical adviser. For a long time we tried in vain to detect from his behavior what those rules might be, and at last we have discovered them:

"Eat whatever you fancy; it is the only safe rule. Drink whatever you like, so long as it is the best. Do both every time you get a chance,"

BEGUN THE GRIND

Many Spectators Present at the Opening Session of the Fifty-Second Congress.

Several New Members of the Senate, Including ex-Secretary of War Proctor, Sworn In.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8.—In defiance of the rain which prevailed from early morning till about noon, when there was a slight clearing up of the weather, the senate galleries were crowded with spectators eager to witness the opening of the Fifty-second congress.

The presidential and diplomatic galleries were unoccupied, but the reserved sections were well filled with ladies, including wives and daughters of senators. Here and there throughout the chamber the desks of the senators who were to take their seats as senators for the first time were marked by baskets of flowers, and the vice president's desk was distinguished in a like manner. There was an unusually large number of senators to be sworn in, counting up seventeen without the senator from Florida. Neither the name of Mr. Call nor that of Mr. Davidson were on the printed list of senators.

At noon the vice president took the chair and the session was opened with prayer by the chaplain, Rev. J. G. Butler. The vice president welcomed senators to the resumption of their official duties, and called the senate to order. The vice president then laid before the senate the credentials of new senators, and the letters of resignation received by him during the recess. Those papers were read, the first being the letter of resignation of Senator Regan of Texas, and the appointment by the governor of that state of Mr. Chilton in his stead. The next credentials read were those of Mr. Felton of California, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Hearst, and the next were the resignation of Mr. Edmunds of Vermont, and the appointment of Mr. Proctor in his stead. The next credentials read were those of Mr. Call and Mr. Davidson, each claiming to be senator from Florida. After discussion, both credentials were placed on file.

SENATOR BRICE'S CASE.

The credentials of Mr. Brice as senator-elect from Ohio having been presented and read, Mr. Sherman said:

> Before the oath of office is administered to Mr. Brice, I desire to say that a large portion of the citizens of Ohio contend that he was not an inhabitant of that state at the time of his election, and was therefore not eligible to a seat in this body. On examining the precedents—of which there are several in the history of the government, and some of them most important—I am entirely satisfied that Mr. Brice is entitled to be sworn in on the prima facie case of his credentials, which are regular in form. I simply give this notice, however, so that his being sworn may not be considered any waiver, or any misapprehension or construction, if the people or the legislature of Ohio should assert and prove to the satisfaction of the senate that Mr. Brice was not at the time of his election a resident of Ohio. I think that this statement from me is proper and necessary. But I make no objection to the swearing in of Mr. Brice.

The swearing of the newly elected or appointed senators was then proceeded with. They were sworn in groups of four or five, in the first group being Mr. Brice, who was escorted by Mr. Kenna. In the next group were Mr. Chilton of Texas, Mr. Dubois of Idaho, Mr. Felton of California, and Mr. Gallinger of New Hampshire. Mr. Hoar said that as to Mr. Chilton there was a question as to whether the governor of Texas had the power to appoint before the vacancy had actually occurred. He would make no objection to the oath being administered to Mr. Chilton now, but he should afterward move to refer the case to the committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Hale said that he desired to examine the credentials of Mr. Dubois, and asked that they lie on the table till to-morrow. That was agreed to, and the other senators in the group were sworn in.

The name of Mr. Hill, senator-elect from New York, was not printed on the list of senators nor were his credentials presented.

A Terrible Gas Explosion.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 8.—An explosion of gas occurred at the works of the Maryland Steel company, Sparrow's Point, early this morning and several men were injured. Three of the victims have since died. Another is not expected to live. Four others were badly injured, but they are not believed to be fatally hurt. The dead and injured are:

Dead—Arthur M. Austin, George Braidwood, John Lynch.

Wounded—Arthur Pump, very badly burned and internally injured; Washington Sapp, Thomas Miller (colored), August Bell (colored), William Tubman (colored).

Arthur Pugh died from the effects of his injuries to-night.

Died From Exposure.

DRAYTON, N. D., Dec. 8.—Stephen Olson, a farmer, accompanied by his daughter, twenty-three years of age, left Hallock, Minn., Friday to drive to their home about six miles northeast of this place on the Minnesota side of the Red river. Yesterday their bodies were found, both having been frozen to death in the blizzard that raged at the time. The bodies were found about eighty rods from the cutter, which was overturned. The horse broke loose from the cutter and was found alive. Miss Olson was to have been married yesterday to a prominent young business man of Kennedy, Minn.

Killed in a Wreck.

WEST PLAINS, Mo., Dec. 8.—A construction train with thirty-eight men in the caboose was backing into this place to-day when it collided with a special freight train. The caboose was smashed into splinters and four of the workmen in it were killed outright. They were Patrick Lavan, Albert Miller, Matt McNamara, an unknown man. Of the other thirty-four men occupying the caboose twenty were seriously injured, it is feared some of them fatally.

Mrs. McKenzie May Die.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Dec. 8.—George James, the actor, who was scalded in the accident Nov. 28, when a Flint & Pere Marquette train ran into the rear coach of the Lake Shore express, died to-day. Another wreck victim, Mrs. J. A. McKenzie of Minneapolis, is very low, and is not expected to live. James makes the tenth unfortunate to suffer death.

Killed by a Train.

HINCKLEY, Minn., Dec. 8.—Michael Farmer, a resident here, was found cut in two by some train this morning in the St. Paul & Duluth yard.

Is Prof. Denton the Bomb Thrower?

NEW YORK, Dec. 8.—Four persons have to-day expressed the opinion that the head of the dead bomb thrower, who perished in his attempt to blow up Millionaire Russell Sage last Friday, is that of "Prof. Denton," a mysterious crank who has long been known in Brooklyn and in this city. The identification is not complete, but the gentlemen named knew Denton, and are positive that the bomb thrower's features strongly resemble his. The dead head at the morgue was opened to-day and the brains were weighed and the skull was taken away to avoid suspected contemplated theft.

CONDENSED TELEGRAMS.

Fifty-eight bodies have been recovered from the mine at St. Etienne, France. Six men have been rescued alive.

The engagement of Prince Albert Victor of Wales and Princess Victoria of Teck was celebrated at Marlborough house yesterday.

The United States supreme court has postponed until the second Monday in January the hearing of the cases of Fielden and Schwab, the Chicago anarchists now imprisoned at Joliet, Ill., for complicity in the Haymarket riots.

The centenary of the death of Mozart, the composer, was observed throughout Austria Sunday. Many musical festivals marked the day. A performance of Mozart's opera, "Don Juan," was given at the Imperial opera house in Vienna.

LOST IN THE CHANNEL.

Several Vessels Wrecked and Those on Board Lost.

LONDON, Dec. 8.—It is reported that the channel steamer Victoria struck the pier at the entrance of the harbor of Calais to-night and was unable to make the harbor. She was therefore obliged to put to sea again.

A terrible storm is raging all along the French coast. The herring smacks at Fieldcamp are in extreme danger. One has already foundered and her crew of twenty-four persons were drowned. Anything like assistance to-night is impossible. The Victoria has twenty-one passengers on board. Some time after she put out to sea she was again sighted to the northeast of Calais. She was showing signals of distress, and it was thought that she had sustained serious damage in her collision with the pier. Several tugs were dispatched to render her all assistance possible and to try to tow her into the harbor of Calais. Rockets were being sent up from a vessel in the Mersey to-night, and life boats were sent out to assist her. It is supposed she has struck on Burbo bank. A barge has gone down at the mouth of the Thames and her crew perished.

THE REDS ARE DANCING.

Troops Ordered to the Cheyenne Agency, Where Fear Is Felt.

HELENA, Mont., Special Telegram, Dec. 8.—A special to the Independent from Miles City says that orders were received from headquarters in St. Paul for troops at Fort Keogh to go to the Cheyenne agency, as the reds are dancing in violation of the orders agency, and have notified the agent that they intend to make an attack

Since the order of the general land office allowing those settlers who claimed prior rights within the reservation to make final proofs thereon trouble has been feared and the Indians have made threats. Sheriff Jones and C. H. Thompson returned from the agency last night with one of two Indians arrested for killing cattle. The other one managed to escape. Considerable difficulty was experienced in making the capture, as the reds put every obstacle possible in their way. Considerable alarm is felt in that section. Danger is feared from roving reds bent on plunder and murder rather than concerted action.

A VESSEL MISSING.

Great Anxiety Felt for a Large Passenger Steamer.

CHICAGO, Dec. 8.—The big passenger propellor, the Fountain City, of Milwaukee, carrying a crew of twenty men, is missing, and marine men fear that she went down in the tremendous gale of yesterday. Telegrams began to pour in at the barge office this morning, inquiring if the boat had arrived here.

The Fountain City has been operating between Milwaukee, St. Joseph and Benton Harbor. She left Milwaukee Saturday, in company with the propeller Marquette, bound for St. Joseph. The steamers became separated in the darkness. The Fountain City has not been seen.

Something In the Wind.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Dec. 8.—It is suspected that the four distinguished Winona gentlemen, Messrs. Sinclair, Yale, Youmans and Wilson, who are here working for the convention in St. Paul, have other matters on hand. They have been earnestly discussing some subject, and it is known that Winona is more or less interested in booms, bridges and other affairs that come before the departments and congress, and it may be that some of those features are engaging a part of their attention. Yale and Sinclair called upon Senator Davis to-night and afterwards had an earnest colloquy with their Winona colleagues. In fact while some of the gentlemen are very mysterious, one of them admitted that they had something they were looking after which would be made public in due time.

No Outbreak Expected.

BLUNT, S. D., Special, Dec. 8.—Hon. B. H. Hoover came down from Forest City and Cheyenne agency yesterday, and he tells your correspondent that all this talk about an Indian outbreak this winter is bosh; that there is not a word of truth in the matter. The reports which were rife a few days ago that a band of reds have left Cheyenne agency for Pine Ridge on mischief bent proves to be a canard. The Indians who have gone to the latter agency are merely on a friendly visit, nothing more. That story of the Indians selling their cattle and converting the proceeds into arms and ammunition is wholly untrue. Mr. Hoover inquired into the matter carefully, and knows what he is talking about, and declares all attempts to create trouble at Cheyenne will fall to the ground.

Solidifies the Triple Alliance.

VIENNA, Dec. 8.—The treaties of commerce which have recently been negotiated between Germany, Austria-Hungary and Italy, which it is expected, will shortly be ratified by the parliaments of the three countries, will, if approved, go into effect on Feb. 1, 1892, and will remain in operation until 1903. The tariffs established by the new treaties are identical. The same duties on similar classes of goods will be collected by all three countries. Great political importance is attached to this fact as solidifying the triple alliance by bringing about a closer and more enduring commercial union between the three nations party to that compact. The tariff was made public to-day.

A Catholic Church Destroyed.

FORT MADISON, Iowa, Dec. 8.—The fine Catholic church at St. Paul, Iowa, fifteen miles northeast of this city, burned last night. The cause was the falling of a chandelier. Loss, $45,000; insurance, $5,000.

London's Latest Scandal.

LONDON, Dec. 8.—A large crowd was present to-day to hear the testimony in the St. John-Marius divorce suit. A surgeon testified in support of the charges of cruelty made by Miss St. John. The plaintiff was subjected to a rigid cross-examination regarding the charges made by her husband that she had been criminally intimate with Arthur Cohen. She denied the charge.

The farmers who have butter and eggs to sell this winter are winners.

The weather has turned warm again. We are having all kinds of weather in a week.

Fred Ames was in town again last Monday. He has accepted a position in Minneapolis.

The train failed to arrive last Friday owing to the blizzard, It came up Saturday afternoon,

We would like to suggest to the Great Northern that if is impossible to get the train here before four o'clock, why not change the time? It is annoying to have the train from three to five hours late every day.

The wheat blockade has been raised and the railroad company is now furnishing plenty of cars. Eleven cars of wheat was shipped from here on Monday and fifteen more will follow today. twelve more are expected today which will make a total for the week of 38 cars or about 25,000 bushels,

TWO NEW FIELDS.

Two new fields in Uncle Sam's farm invites occupants. The Sisseton-Wahpeton reservation, in South Dakota, reached from Browns Valley, Watertown and Hankinson on the Great Northern, and the Fort Berthold reservation in North Dakota, reached from White Earth and other stations on the Great Northern. A government land office for this district was recently established at Minot, of which the well known Col, W. C. Plummer. of North Dakota is receiver. The colonel will take pleasure in giving inquirers information about the Mouse River Country.

Here's another exasperating development in the working of the Chinese exclusion act. A Chinaman in jail in Tuscon gave an explanation of the attempted exodus of Chinese from Mexico into the United States. He said that one Chinaman who was recently arrested for illegally entering the United States from Mexico and was taken to San Francisco had first sent home all his savings of several years work in Mexico and then deliberately crossed to the United States that he might be captured and sent home to China at the expense of the United States.

Admission free but usual price will be charged for supper. All are cordially invited.

Committee of Arrangements.

The Great Northern has had a heap of trouble the past two days. Yesterday over six trains were "stalled" on the Barnsville grade, some for two hours at a time and this morning the engine on the passenger train broke down just as they reached this city, and as no extra engines are kept here the one on the St. Vincent line took its place necessitating the delay of the St. Vincent train until the engine could be replaced which took three hours. The St. Hilaire engine took a special train down to Barnesville last night and while returning this morning this morning one of the drivers broke and had to be repaired before the St. Hilaire train for this morning could leave, the repairing took a good while and the train did not pull out until after 12.—Crookston Daily Times.

It is a well known fact that St. Paul and Minneapolis have always wanted the earth and their latest scheme is a petition to President Harrison for the setting apart of the whole northeastern part of this state including the great timber belts and beautiful lakes of which any state may feel proud, as a national park. At a glance, or on the spur of the moment, one would say it is a good thing and should be assisted in every way possible. On the other hand, however, we would call the attention of the people of this valley to the fact that our greatest want today is an outlet from the great Red River Valley to Duluth, the coming metropolis Already the Duluth & Winnipeg has made great headway with the proposed extension of their road and in a short time it will reach the Red River Valley from Lake of the Woods. The Twin Cities are jealous and envy every move on the part of the Duluthians and the step taken by the twin city people at this time is a cowardly act and should be denounced. Should the president set apart the lands required as a national park it would for the next fifty years, bar settlers as well as railroads from entering on said domain, and steps should be taken to have such a move checkmated at once. Admitting there was a bill in congress for such a purpose yet it was designed by those who wish the earth and hope to try and prevent access to Duluth from this country by direct route if possible and if President Harrison sets his hand to such a document it will be a lasting calamity to the people of the Red River Valley as well as the whole of this part of the state,—Hallock Enterprise.

Under the provisions of the McKinley act, after January 1, 1892, the duties will be restored on coffee, sugar, molasses and hides imported from those countries that have not in the meantime negotiated treaties of reciprocity with this country. This is not only the law, but it is the manifest dictate of justice. For example, the British West Indies cannot expect to enjoy equal privileges with the Spanish West Indies when the former withhold the concessions to our exports, which the latter have granted. So Venezuela should not in simple equity have the same advantages in our markets as Brazil when she levies heavy duties on our flour while Brazil gives our produce a preferential schedule. In other words "reciprocity" means what the dictionary defines it to mean. The chief interest that attaches to the situation arises from the doubt as to what course England will pursue on behalf of her colonies. Will she permit her West Indian possessions to lose the benefit of our market for her sugar and molasses by refusing assent to a treaty giving us the recirocal advantages that we demand. A few weeks will answer this important question.—Herald.

How Nature Distributes Her Gifts.

When you and I get rich, my dear, as some day we surely shall, what, are we going to do with all our money! We will hunt up some of the improvident ones, those who could never make the two ends meet, those who through goodheartedness, or lack of forethought or unselfish desire to make other folks happy, have never laid by a cent, and we will give those silly people such a good time they will carry its impress all through their after lives, as a pat of butter carries the print. We will slyly pay the bills for improvident ones who have grown gray in the effort to make a decent funeral for dead horses. They shall forget how to spell "care" and their new and happy dialect shall know no such words as "monthly payments," "righteous dues" or "can't afford it."

I am convinced that as a rule it is not the sweet hearted people who take out this world's gain. There is many a poor beggar with not a change of linen to his back who would make a more royal host, had the smiling face of fortune turned his way, than the rightful owner of the vast estates at whose gate he stands and begs. The big hearts too often go with the empty purse, and the little, wizened, skinflint souls, that it would take a thousand of to crowd the passage through the eye of a needle, gain all the golden favors of the god of plenty.—Chicago Herald.

A Table with Growing Legs.

I had presented to me on the 3d of May last a small fancy table as a birthday present—painted black, varnished and gilded. However, it had not been in the house very long before the legs were observed to be growing, and they are continuing to do so. One of the legs has put out a shoot four inches long, upon which there are ten leaves. Altogether it is a very pretty table, with its black and gold, and now the green. I think they are apple tree leaves. I set it out of doors occasionally, so that a little moisture might be given to it to continue the growth, as I do not know but it may blossom and bring forth fruit, which would very much increase the curiosity.—Ontario Cor. Freaks Among Apples.

Among apples, as among living things, there are freaks—forms appearing to individual trees at the very extremes of normal conditions. A member of the state board of agriculture, in one of the northern counties, has an apple tree that has never had a petal. No one would ever know it was in blossom, yet it bears fruit abundantly. This shows that the pretty rosy parts of the flower, the petals, are nonessential to fruitfulness. Some contend that the brilliant colors of the petals of flowers are given to attract insects, and arrange for cross fertilization. Others contend that the petals act as protectors of the undeveloped parts, while others believe that, to some extent, they have the functions of leaves, and prepare food for the younger parts. Whatever it be, we see by this freak it is possible to have apples without them.

Then there are seedless apples—apples with no core. There may be germs in the ovariums, and the germs may be properly fertilized by the pollen, but the power to absorb nutrition is weak and the ovaries die in infancy from sheer starvation. Having been once fertilized, the fleshy part we know emphatically as the apple grows on and matures, though the seed and core do not. Twins or even triplets are often seen in apples, as in so many other organisms, and just as in other organisms by independent germs coming into juxtaposition in an early stage of development, when the stronger body absorbs a considerable portion of the other.—Thomas Meehan in Philadelphia Ledger.

He Couldn't Recognize French Money.

It requires very elastic credulity to accept in these days of universal commerce the existence of a railroad employe who had never seen a French bank note, and who, when he did, considered it some sort of an advertising circular. But such a fellow did exist, and he worked on the railway that runs out to Sceaux. One day he found on the platform four bank notes of 100 francs each, put them in his pocket and said, "Some nice women on the top; I'll take 'em home to my little boy." Thanks to his ignorance, he was only able when he got home at night to present his son with three pictures. The boy carried them to school the next day, and at recess was about cutting out the "nice women," when the teacher saw what he was doing.

"Where did you get these notes?" he demanded. "Father gave them to me." "What for?" "To play with." "Very well; I shall take charge of them." They went together to the police station, and there the matter was satisfactorily explained. The money had been lost by a market woman, and she was so delighted at receiving the best part of it that she actually handed one of the bank notes to the man, exclaiming: "Here, take this, you old fool, and if you didn't know before what it was, you will know in the future."—Paris Corespondent Boston Herald.

The Tomato Season.

The season of the tomato is short, yet being essentially a plant of the tropics, it can not be ripened often in England, except under glass. As a hot house plant, however, it is widely used there, certain varieties developing special adaptation to these conditions. In the short but fervent summer in New England, on the contrary, it finds itself quite at home. Though the plant like many others of tropical origin is highly susceptible to injury from frost, the seeds are very hardy, sustaining no harm from remaining in the ground throughout winters.

If left to come up of themselves they do so freely from such accidental plantings of the previous season, and here in Massachusetts will begin to ripen fruit about the last of August, while plants which are started early in the hot bed or window box will begin nearly a month sooner. A large field of tomatoes in the vicinity of Boston commenced ripening fruit one summer about the 10th of July, at which time they brought twelve dollars per bushel in the market.—Boston Transcript.

Seeds Used for Ornaments.

The seed called Job's tears is used in Siam and by the Naga and other Assam tribes in the construction of earrings and other simple and elegant articles of personal adornment. Necklaces of these seeds are frequently worn, and baskets and other ornamental articles are occasionally decorated with them, especially those made in Nepal. The Angame Nagas construct elegant earrings in which a rosette of these seeds surrounds a greenish beetle wing. These grains seem to stand a good chance of coming into more general use in Europe in the construction of artificial flowers, laces, bugle trimmings and other such purposes for which glass beads are now used, and possibly also in Catholic countries for the manufacture of rosaries.—Chambers' Journal.

A Turkish Bank Note.

The bill is on imperial green paper, a color held sacred in Turkey, which the government alone is permitted to use. On the top and sides are the following words in Turkish, "To be paid to the bearer, without interest, twenty piasters." At the top of the note is the sultan's toghra, surrounding which is a quotation from the koran. Underneath are the words, "Twenty piasters, paper money, to be used in the place of gold at the Bank of Constantinople." At the base of the note is the seal of the mint, and on the back the seal of the minister of the treasury. The toghra is considered sacred, and is guarded by the three highest officials of the mint, whose sole duty is to watch it.—New York Advertiser.

Light Without Flame.

If one or two pieces of phosphorus of the size of peas be inclosed in a small bottle half full of olive oil and kept for some little time the air space in the bottle will become filled with a phosphorescent vapor. The phosphorescence will fade, but may be renewed by simply uncorking the bottle. Sufficient light will be given out to tell the time by; in fact this method is used by watchmen in some places where explosives are stored.—New York Recorder.

TRAVELING BY NIGHT IN LONDON.

The gray and misty night,
  Slim trees that hold the night among
  Their branches, and along
The vague embankment, light on light.

The sadden, racing lights!
  I can just hear, distinct, aloof
  The gayly clattering hoof
Beating the rhythm of festive nights.

The gardens to the weeping moon
  Sigh back the breath of tears,
  Oh, the refrain of years on years
'Neath the weeping moon!

—Arthur Symons in Academy.

His Way.

An incident that is narrated of General McClellan sheds light on the question so often asked: Why did his soldiers love him so dearly?

When the Army of the Potomac left Harrison Landing it marched to Newport News, along the north bank of the James river. The advance division began its march early in the morning of Aug. 15; but the rear division did not move out of camp until 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day.

Just at dusk a creek was reached. It must be crossed, according to southern custom, by fording or by a single log by the roadside. The soldiers, disliking to fill their shoes with water, were trying to cross on this single log, which of course caused an obstruction to those behind, and really put the rear of the army in danger.

Soon several officers rode up and took in the situation. There was need of more haste. One of the officers called out:

"Wade right through, my men, wade right through."

Some surly fellow from the ranks growled out:

"Wade through yourself, and see how you like it."

No sooner had he spoken than the officer dismounted and waded through the creek. It was then discovered that the officer was General George B. McClellan.

The soldiers gave him a hearty cheer, plunged into the creek, and afterward the point was passed more rapidly four abreast.

The general might have reprimanded the soldier—indeed, he might have had him arrested and dealt with severely. But under the circumstances he did just the right thing—he went where he asked his men to go; and his men were glad to go where he led.—Youth's Companion.

All but One.

A shipload of fine horses was consigned from Calcutta to Bombay, under the charge of a very honest but somewhat dull agent in the employ of an East India company. While the horses were being landed at the slip, they managed to break away from the men in charge, and ran like wild animals through the city.

The agent caught one of them, and, mounting him, gave chase. After several hours of exciting work, with the help of his men, he had captured all but one of the horses, as he counted them.

Finally he made his reluctant way to the superintendent's office to give an account of the matter. The superintendent came to the door and listened to the story:

"And you say there were 124 horses in, and you have eighty of them in the company's stables and forty-three back in the steamer temporarily?"

"Yes, sir, all safe but one, and we cannot find him anywhere."

"What is that horse you are riding? Have you counted him?" asked the superintendent.

"Well, I am an ass! Of course this is one of 'em!" And the agent rode off in disgust, while the superintendent roared with laughter.—London Tit-Bits.

Superstitious Signs.

Two well known and energetic Detroit merchants, who, though rivals in business, are good friends and fond of each other's society, were coming down town one morning and the conversation turned upon popular superstitions, when one of them stepped off the sidewalk to avoid passing under a ladder.

"What did you do that for?" asked the one who walked right along under it.

"I don't know exactly," replied the other doubtfully.

"Superstitious, I suppose."

"I suppose so."

"Well," banteringly, "I'm not that kind. I don't believe in signs and what they express."

"No kind?" with a faint smile.

"Nary a sign," with confidence.

"I thought so."

"Why did you say that?"

"Because I think so, that's why. And so would any other man who read that great big sign you've got up over your store inscribed, 'The Best Goods in Town for the Least Money.'"

"Oh!" laughed the other one, and he took him in behind the first Indian they met and gave him a fine cigar as a brain tonic.—Detroit Free Press.

How, Where and When Accidents Occur.

To the question as to when, where, and how accidents occur, the only general answer that can be given is: When they are least expected. The commercial traveler who insures because he is exposed to danger while on the rail draws indemnity for an injury received while winding a clock. The dentist who endeavors to protect himself against possible personal injury while using his tools is disabled by a cinder in his eye. It is to be noted, however, that more accidents in proportion to population occur in the south, the southwest and the west than in the northern, the middle and the eastern states. The older and more closely settled portions of the country are the safer ones. As to the times and seasons, midwinter, with its icy sidewalks, and midsummer, with its great variety of outdoor occupations, are especially prolific of accidents.—James B. Pitcher in Forum.

Sawfishes.

Sawfishes belong to the order of rays, although their bodies have the shape of ordinary fishes. They swim wholly with their tails, and the long weapons which adorn their noses are merely prolongations of the snout, armed on either side with teeth in sockets and covered with rough skin of great toughness. With this formidable instrument they attack their prey, tearing pieces of flesh from its body or ripping open the abdomen to feed upon the intestines of the victim. There is something positively abnormal about all these creatures called rays. They suggest the notion of fishes antediluvian, and it is not surprising to find many large and extinct species among the fossils of vanished epochs.—Interview in Washington Star

WANTED--A BURGLAR.

THE STRANGE STORY OF A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.

BY J. WEBSTER BAYNES.

CHAPTER VII

A CURIOUS APPRENTICESHIP.

After a moment's silent scrutiny, she said, firmly, I want to be taught how to open a safe; I will pay well for the information, and whoever supplies it to me will run no risk whatever. Can you open a safe quietly and expeditiously, and if so, when can you commence to give me lessons?"

The clear business-like way in which this was said seemed to startle the young man very considerably, and the tell-tale color which mounted to his temples showed his embarrassment; but recovering himself quickly he said, "I can, I think, open any safe if I get a fair chance at it; as for teaching you, that's a different matter. However, we can try, and I'm ready to begin any time you like." He spoke up clearly and firmly, and his tone evidently created a good impression.

"If that is the case," replied the lady, "no time need be lost. It is not necessary for me to know anything further about you, characters in such a case can hardly be looked for on either side. To me you are simply 'J. L.', to you I am only known as 'B 148.' What your past history is has nothing to do with me; what my motive may be is no business of yours. If you teach me what I want to know I will pay you well. Name your own price, and if it is anywhere within the bounds of reason, we shall not quarrel about terms. I intend taking an office in the city or borough, and shall look to you to procure second-hand safes to practice upon. All necessary funds I will provide, and I may as well say now that it will pay you double as well to behave honestly with me as to try any sharp practices. I will see about an office this afternoon. You, if you agree to work for me, can be on the look-out for safes on which I can practice. To-morrow I will find money to purchase such as you may think fit for our purpose. I shall be compelled to trust you to a great extent. It is for you to prove whether my trust is justified or not; but stay," continued the lady, folding her hands firmly on her lap and bending forward, "let me see your eyes, let me look at you straight, I've a great faith in my power to read character."

Such a curious request from a lady was sufficient to upset the equanimity of most men. For a moment "J. L." was taken aback, then recovering himself, he said, with a smile, "Certainly, if you wish it," at the same time looking his questioner straight in the face. His eyes were bright and clear, but he could not keep down a twinkle of amusement as he gazed steadily at the business-like and pre-occupied face of "B 148."

How long that gaze would have lasted if left to "J. L." to decide is doubtful, but the lady suddenly rose, saying as she did so, "Thank you, I am satisfied. If you wish any money now, I will find you some on account; if not, I will meet you to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, at the entrance to Moorgate-street Station. Will that arrangement suit you?"

"Perfectly," was the reply made as J. L. took up his hat preparatory to going, "but am I to understand that I am to use my own ideas as to what safes to buy, and what prices to give?"

"You are to understand this," said the lady, "that you have to teach me how to open a safe—in fact, any safe—and provided I can acquire the knowledge, the cost of the lesson will be nothing to me."

"I understand, and will meet you tomorrow morning at 11, and report what I've done," he replied, upon which the lady conducted him downstairs and let him out into the street without further remark.

"Well, if that does not beat my comprehension altogether," muttered "J. L." to himself, as, after a rapid glance at the house, he moved quickly away. "And so that is the Countess the Imp talks about, is it, eh?" he continued, "not that she is a countess, I should say, but she's a lady any way, and a determined one too; but what on earth can her object be. Well, at any rate, I shall run no risk in teaching her how to open a safe, that is, if she can be taught, which is doubtful." Puzzling his brains to find an explanation of the strange adventure in which he had engaged to take a part, "J. L." after half an hour's walk found himself in a quiet little street in Dalston, in which he lived, and having let himself into one of a row of houses which stood a little back from the street, having a few feet of garden in front, he proceeded right through to the back premises, calling out as he passed the foot of the stairs, "All right, mother, it is only me." Not waiting for an answer, he made his way into the strip of garden at the back of the house, at the bottom of which was a long low shed with a glass roof. Opening the door of this he entered what was evidently a mechanic's workshop. A wide bench fitted with a beautifully finished lathe, occupied one side. A central table, racks of tools on the walls, a small forge and anvil, a litter of shavings and iron fillings on the floor, were further evidence of the uses to which the place was put. Seating himself on the table he proceeded to light his pipe, and this accomplished he folded his arms across his breast and swung his legs to and fro, a very meditative look settling on his face the while. "If I can but please her," he said to himself after some moment's thought, "I'll perhaps be able to run the drill on my own hook after all;" and with that he slipped off the table, and opening a cupboard, drew out a complicated looking piece of machinery, evidently a model, which he proceeded to examine closely. "Confound the thing, it's bound to go," he burst out as he returned it to his place. After doing this he moved to the end of the shed opposite to the entrance, and inspected what had once been a door, but which was now mad up with beams and planking. Apparently satisfied with what he saw he retraced his steps, and leaving word in the house as to when he would return, he proceeded as arranged with B148" in quest of second-hand safes.

Next morning, punctual at 11 o'clock, "J. L." was at the entrance to Moorgate-street Station, but punctual as he was, "B 148" was waiting. Acknowledging his presence with a quiet little nod, the lady asked if he had made any progress. In reply, he handed her a slip of paper on which were particulars of two safes, a Chatwood and a Milner, which he stated could be delivered that afternoon. After glancing at it "B 148" said that unfortunately she had not obtained a place wherein they could work quietly and without risk of causing inquiries, and that she was at a loss what to do under the circumstances.

"I've been thinking of that," replied "J. L.," "and if you will trust me, I will take you to where I live in Lorne-stree, Dalston and where I have a workshop which is the very place for our purpose. Should it suit you when you see it you may at any time enter it without attracting notice, as it has a back entrance from the lane which has been blocked up for a long time, but which I will open. I will assure you madam, you will run no risk. Will you see the place?

For some moments the lady hesitated to answer, but at length after pacing a few times to and fro, she turned to her companion and said decisively, "I will go; if it is far call a cab, and give the man directions where to drive to."

Hailing a four-wheeler "J. L." held the door open for the lady to enter, and was about to mount beside the driver, but she gave a decided negative, asking him to take his seat opposite her. As they drove along she plied him with questions as to the various kinds and makes of safes, the difficulties to be encountered in opening them, and the probabilities of her being able to acquire the power. Her desire for information was only interrupted by their arrival at the end of Lorne-street, where they alighted. Telling the cabman to wait, "J. L." led the way, explaining as they walked, that in passing through the house, they would only be seen by a little maid of all work. The lady, nodding her assent, followed him without any apparent hesitation, and, in a few moments they stood in the workshop, which "B, 148" examined critically.

"Is this the door into the lane?" she asked, pointing to the end of the room, and in answer to his affirmative, asked when it could be opened.

"In two hours from now, and I can have the safes in to-night," was the reply.

"That will do, but no, stay a moment," said the lady, looking at him keenly; "I have a question or two to ask. I said yesterday that to me you need only be known as "J. L." I still adhere to that, but—you are not the kind of person I should have expected to answer my advertisement. Are you connected in any way with the police?"

"Madam," said the young man, laughing, "if I was I should naturally deny it, but I am not in any shape or form."

"Then are you a—a burglar; and if not, what is your motive in undertaking this business?"

"As to the first question," replied "J. L.," still smiling, "you can scarcely expect me to incriminate myself; as to the latter, if you wish to know, I want to make money. See," he continued, flushing and speaking very earnestly, at the same time striding to the cupboard, and bringing out his model, "I want to perfect and patent this. What it may be does not matter now, but once completed, I believe it will make my fortune; that explains my present motive in assisting you. Are you satisfied?"

"I am," said the lady, the expression of her face softening as she spoke. "I feel I have been very fortunate. Teach me how to open a safe and I will not fail you about your invention; but come, let us be going, I will find you money to purchase the safes, and leave it to you to have everything ready for tomorrow morning."

Seeing that she was anxious to be moving, "J. L." saw her to the cab, and having received from her a liberal supply of money for present requirements, he set energetically to work to have all in readiness for his pupil on the morrow.

The delivery of the safes was a matter of no small difficulty, but at length this was satisfactorily accomplished, and, when at 10 o'clock on the following morning, "B 148" once more found her way into the little workshop, two formidable examples upon which to try her prentice hand met her gaze. The sight seemed to fill her with a great desire to commence upon them at once, and removing her cloak and gloves she exclaimed impetuously, "Now, I'm ready."

"J. L." glanced at her admiringly. Her plainly made but tight fitting navy blue dress showed the lines of her beautifully moulded bust and figure to full advantage. Her delicate poised head, with its wealth of hair, her slender white throat encircled by a band of soft creamy frilling, and the warm color mantling her cheeks called up by her eagerness to begin, made her as she stood beside him a picture the beauty of which he realised with a suddenness that for a moment made him dumb. Noticing his silence, the lady glanced at him quickly, and roused him from his short reverie by saying abruptly, "What is the matter? What are you thinking about? I'm quite ready?"

"I—I hardly know," he replied, with a shrug of his shoulders and a curious smile. "I was thinking how funny and unreal it all seems; this business, I mean. However, I suppose we had better get to work."

"There is nothing funny in the matter so far as I am concerned," said "B 148," coldly, as she turned away.

"Confound it! now I've vexed her," thought the young man, his face flushing at her altered tone, but rousing himself he essayed to give his handsome pupil a first lesson in safe-opening. "Madam," he said, deferentially, "this matter cannot be gone about hurriedly. The experience I have is the result of years of experiment and labor. The different lock combinations are innumerable, and until you know something of locks and the general principles of their manufacture, it would be useless trying to pick them. It is not so much a matter of strength at all. Knowledge, and delicacy of touch, the latter showing you the exact point where opposition arises, and perhaps a certain amount of natural aptitude, are necessary. To show you what I mean by knowledge, I could readily open these two safes, because I have seen the keys; here they are in fact. I know the exact forms of the wards inside, and could draw them if necessary. From that drawing, supposing the keys were lost, I could easily form from these wires a false key which would answer the purpose. But see, amongst this bunch there is sure to be some one or two which will come near opening the smaller of the two safes; we will try it first." Quickly turning over a lot of wire counterfeits, he selected three; and handing them to his pupil, he said, "Now, see which of these will be the most likely to open it."

The lady went down on one knee and tried the keys in turn more than once, then handing them back, said quietly, "I don't think any of them would do, but this one turns further than the others."

"Let me try," was the answer; and "J. L.," kneeling by her side, deftly inserted the keys, seeming to read through his nervous fingers the details of the intricate words against which they were pressed. "Yes," he said, confidentially, "you are right this one will do, but the bend here is too large. My sense of touch tells me what is wrong, and I could alter it at once, but I will show you clearly that I am right first." Rising he lit a candle, and held the key in the smoke of it till it was coated a thick black.

"Now, then, try it again; press it firmly several times against any obstruction you may find, and withdraw it carefully." Obeying these instructions in silence, the lady withdrew the key, and held it up to him. Taking it, he moved towards the light, and calling her to him, showed just at the bed he had indicated a mark where the candle smoke had been rubbed away. "That is where the key met with resistance," he said. "I will alter the curve and then we will see what we can do." In a moment or two, with tools which he had at hand, he made the desired change, working with the ease of a man who knew exactly what to do, and once more asked his companion to try the lock. With a little pressure the key revolved, and to the delight of his pupil the heavy door of the safe swung open. Her pleasure was, however, short lived as "J. L." reminded her that, knowing what the key was like, the opening of the lock was a matter of ease to any one with tools and experience. He insisted that if his instructions were to have any practical result she must begin at the beginning, and with this end in view he produced from various drawers and boxes an almost endless variety of locks and sections of locks, and set her to studying them. He also brought from the house books on locks and lockmaking, profusely illustrated, which he suggested she should take home with her and study at her leisure. So engrossed had she been in her lesson that the flight of time had scarcely been noticed, and it was not until her instructor hinted that it was time for her to rest that she glanced at her watch to find that she had been more than four hours in the little workshop. She felt tired, but enthusiastic, and on her way to the cabstand in Essex Road she had many pertinent questions to put to "J. L.," who walked at her side, carrying the books. As for that individual, when he had seen his mysterious employer into a four-wheeler, he turned homeward in a more thoughtful mood than usual, which is saying a great deal, for he was not much given to hilarity at the best of times. For four hours he had not once thought of his model, and even went to bed that night without giving its future prospects the slightest consideration.

AN AMERICAN DRINK.

How Soda Water Is Made, and the Extent of Its Manufacture.

Soda water is an American drink. It is as essentially American as porter, Rhine wine, and claret are distinctively English, German, and French. The most interesting fact in the manufacture of soda water is that it contains no soda. The prominent ingredients are marble dust and sulphuric acid, neither of which is regarded as healthful nor palatable when taken separately. Moreover, to render them so in combination requires a pressure of at least 150 pounds to the square inch—a condition dangerous to life and limb except under proper safeguards and with the strongest machinery. The generator is, in fact, made of gun-metal iron tested to 500 pounds to the square inch. Into this is put marble dust, to which, from another strong chamber, is led the sulphuric acid. Then the to are cradled, and the gas generated is passed into steel fountains lined with block tin, two thirds full of the water to be charged.

These fountains are then securely fastened, and, like huge bombs in size and almost as destructive, are carried in wagons through the streets, to be stored under drug-store counters. Surely in all the history of fairy-land there is nothing more marvelous than the escape of this sparkling, bubbling, foam crested liquor, like an enchanted prince from the gloomy death-chamber to delight and refresh the world.

Whiting formerly was used to furnish the carbonate, and whiting and chalk are still used in England. The use of marble dust, under the pretty name of "snowflake," is peculiar to this country. We produce our own marble, moreover, and whiting comes under provisions of the McKinley bill. The chips of the marble Cathedral on Fifth avenue alone supplied twenty-five million gallons of soda water; thus economically we drink up unavailable bits of buildings (public and private), tombstones and monuments.

Except in the improvement of machinery in its methods of distribution, the manufacture of soda water remains much the same. The method employed by the distinguished engineer Bramah is still in use. The man, in fact, whose name is most prominently identified with the national drink in this country was an apprentice of Bramah, and has developed his method here. That form of concentration, moreover, that all sorts of enterprises now take was long since a feature of the soda water industry.

Formerly the actual process took place under the drug store counter. No one has yet estimated the decreased percentage in the loss of life since the drug store boy ceased playing with the vitrol, carbonates and force-pump, as if he had a squirt-gun in a hogshead of water under an eavetrough. Explosions of soda fountains do sometimes occur, but they have ceased to be a national feature, as on reading old English catalogues of rival manufacturers they seem once to have been.—Harper's Weekly.

CHILDREN ARE GREAT WALKERS

The Little Feet Walk Many Miles a Day, A Tot's Travels.

The capacity of adult men for endurance in walking and speed in running is a pretty well exhausted subject, but the ability of children to keep "on the go" almost ceaselessly often suggests a question as to how far a little one in the nursery or a young boy or girl in the playground walks or runs in the course of a day. An observant parent of a child about 18 months old managed to get at some figures lately on this subject. He had the floor of the child's nursery covered with a cheap white muslin and then strapped to one foot a sort of marking stamp, inked, which made a plain mark on the white surface for every step taken. The child ran about all day just as usual, and at the end of the day the marks were counted, and the sum total aggregated 6,483, which, at the rate of six inches for each step taken, made the sum of the day's travel 3,242 feet, or about three-quarters of a mile. The same father also experimented in a somewhat different way with a boy of between 9 and 10. He bought a pedometer, or walking measure, something like the little machine used for the same purpose by some professional bicyclists. This was carefully introduced into the boy's pocket in such a way that, among the heterogeneous collection of marbles, twine, nails and other rubbish usually forming a boy's valuables, it was not discovered for a couple of days, and the result was, for the first day, a record of ten and three sevenths miles, and for the second, nine and one-eighth miles. The effect of this subrosa walking match made the boy a small hero, and there were less astonished and lugubrious lamentations over the next renewal of his well-worn shoes.

HOW TO CURE OBESITY.

Eat but One Kind of Food at a Meal Is the Plan of a Medical Officer.

In a French journal is announced the discovery of a means, as simple as it is strange, for curing obesity, which is attributed to a medical officer in the army. Thanks to this means, a Colonel who was threatened to be obliged to retire from the army, as he was so heavy that it required two men to lift him into the saddle, became thin in a few weeks, and to such an extent that he had to take means to recover, in a measure, what he had lost. It was to his doctor that he was indebted for becoming a General. The means consisted simply in never eating more than one dish at each meal, no matter what that dish may be, and a person may consume as much as the stomach can bear and satisfy the appetite without the least reserve.

Nevertheless, nothing but the one dish should be taken; no condiments, or soups, or supplementary desserts should be allowed. The system was recommended to a lady who was slightly obese, and who put it into practice with the best results. The lady observed that she suffered no inconvenience whatever from this diet, and the result obtained by the medical officer may be well understood, as she found by her own experience that the partaking of only one dish, whether it be meat, fish, or vegetable, brought on a sense of satiety much sooner than if she had partaken of a variety of dishes.

QUEER APPETITES.

Mental and Physical Sensations That Are Among the Mysteries of Life.

"Talking of peculiarites of appetite," said a citizen in conversation, "I know a man who has not eaten a mouthful of meat in twenty years."

"A vegetarian, eh?" queried a listener.

"No; he took a sudden dislike to meat of any kind and gave up eating it. But he could not tell himself what caused the change in his appetite."

"My wife can never eat an oyster," said one present, "without her skin breaking out with purple spots as large as dimes. She feels no uneasiness, but naturally does not like to be spotted like a pard."

"I was acquainted with a woman out West," said another of the party, "who broke out with prickly heat whenever she saw or tasted goat's milk cheese. Her husband brought some into the house and hid it in a cupboard. When she approached it she began to shiver and declared that she felt the strange prickly sensation."

"'If I did not know that there was no cheese in the house I should think it was that, she said, and then her husband acknowledged that he had done it to test her. The physiological effect satisfied him that it was not in the imagination."—Detroit Free Press.

The Romance of a Shirt Stud.

"Do you see that peculiar looking stud that man is wearing on his shirt front?" said a hotel clerk the other day, pointing to a gentleman standing near by, and on whose expansive bosom was fastened a gold button with a bird in black enamel upon it.

"That man is a St. Louis drummer, and has been wearing that stud for twenty years, to my knowledge," added the clerk. "It was twenty years ago that he married a relative of Patrick Egan, the famous home rule agitator of Nebraska. Previous to that time a certain young business man of Chicago was also courting her, and among the presents he gave her was a pair of cuff buttons, of which that stud was one.

"The rival saw these buttons one day on the young lady's cuffs, and in jest purloined one of them and placed it in his shirt front. When leaving the house afterwards he encountered the Chicago suitor, who spied the jewel. An explanation was demanded of the young lady and an angry scene followed, and the Chicago man left in a huff. When the St. Louis drummer called the next day he proposed and was accepted. After their marriage his wife told him that had the Chicago lover proposed first, which he undoubtedly would have done but for the cuff-button episode, she would have accepted him. Ever since that time the happy husband has been wearing that button, and money could not buy it of him."—San Francisco Call.

About seven years ago I had Bronchitis, which finally drifted into Consumption, so the doctors said, and they had about given me up. I was confined to my bed. One day my husband went for the doctor, but he was not in his office. The druggist sent me a bottle of Piso's Cure for Consumption. I took two doses of it, and was greatly relieved before the doctor came. He told me to continue its use as long as it helped me. I did so, and the result is, I am now sound and well—entirely cured of Consumption.—Mrs. P. E. BAKER, Harrisburg, Illinois, February 20, 1891.

HARRISON'S REPORT.

An Interesting and Comprehensive Message on the Country's Affairs Presented to Congress.

Italians Receive Precious Little Comfort and the Chil'ans Given a Timely Warning.

Congress Urged to Refrain From Disturbing Present Tariff and Silver Coinage Laws.

The following is a synopsis of President Harrison's message:

To the Senate and House of Representatives: The reports of the heads of the several executive departments, required by law to be submitted to me, which are herewith transmitted, and the reports of the secretary of the treasury and the attorney general made directly to congress, furnish a comprehensive view of the administrative work of the last fiscal year relating to internal affairs. It would be of great advantage if these reports could have an attentive perusal by every member of congress and by all who take an interest in public affairs. Such a perusal could not fail to excite a higher appreciation of the vast labor and conscientious efforts which are given to the conduct of our civil administration.

The reports will, I believe, show that every question has been approached, considered and decided from the standpoint of public duty and upon considerations affecting the public interest alone. Again I invite to every branch of the service the attention and scrutiny of congress.

RECIPROCITY.

The Highly Beneficial Results of Diplomatic Negotiations Shown.

The work of the state department during the last year has been characterized by an unusual number of important negotiations and by diplomatic results of a notable and highly beneficial character. Among these are the reciprocal trade arrangements which have been concluded, in the exercise of the powers conferred by section 3 of the tariff law, with the republic of Brazil, with Spain for its West India possessions, and with San Domingo. Like negotiations with other countries have been much advanced, and it is hoped that before the close of the year further definitive trade arrangements of great value will be concluded.

BEHRING SEA.

The Agreement for a Closed Season and the Prospects of Arbitration.

In view of the reports which have been received as to the diminution of the seal herds in the Behring sea, I deemed it wise to propose to her majesty's government, in February last, that an agreement for a closed season should be made, pending the negotiations for arbitration, which then seemed to be approaching a favorable conclusion. After much correspondence and delays for which this government was not responsible, an agreement was reached and signed on the 15th of June, by which Great Britain undertook, from that date and until May 1, 1892, to prohibit the killing by her subjects of seals in the Behring sea, and the government of the United States, during the same period, to enforce its existing prohibition against pelagic sealing and to limit the catch by the fur seal company upon the islands to 7,500 skins. If this agreement could have been reached earlier, in response to the strenuous endeavors of this government, it would have been more effective; but, coming even as late as it did, it unquestionably resulted in greatly diminishing the destruction of seals by the leading sealers.

In my last annual message I stated that the basis of arbitration proposed by her majesty's government for the adjustment of the long-pending controversy as to the seal fisheries was not acceptable. I am glad to be able to announce that terms satisfactory to this government have been agreed upon and that an agreement as to the arbitrators is all that is necessary to the completion of the convention. In view of the advanced petition which this government has taken upon international arbitration, this renewed expression of our adherence to this method for the settlement of disputes such as have arisen in the Behring sea will, I doubt not, meet with the concurrence of congress.

EXPORT OF MEAT.

Several Countries Have Removed the Embargo Upon Pork Products.

The law of the last congress providing a system of inspection of our meats intended for export and clothing the president with power to exclude foreign products from our market in case the country sending them should perpetuate unjust discriminations against any product of the United States, placed this government in a position to effectively urge the removal of such discriminations against our meats.

It is gratifying to be able to state that Germany, Denmark, Italy, Austria and France, in the order named, have opened their ports to inspected American pork products. The removal of these restrictions in every instance was asked for and given solely upon the ground that we had now provided a meat inspection that should be accepted as adequate to the complete removal of the dangers, real or fancied, which had been previously urged. The state department, our ministers abroad, and the secretary of agriculture have co-operated with unflagging and intelligent zeal for the accomplishment of this great result.

The outlines of an agreement have been reached with Germany, looking to equitable trade concessions in consideration of the continued free importation of her sugars, but the time has not yet arrived when this correspondence can be submitted to congress.

AFFAIRS IN BRAZIL.

Advice of the Government Offered in Hopes of Maintaining Peace.

The recent political disturbances in the republic of Brazil have excited regret and solicitude. The information we possessed was too meager to enable us to form a satisfactory judgment of the causes leading to the temporary assumption of supreme power by President Fonseca; but this government did not fail to express to him its anxious solicitude for the peace of Brazil and for the maintenance of the free political institutions which had recently been established there, nor to offer our advice that great moderation should be observed in the clash of parties and the contest for leadership. These counsels were received in the most friendly spirit, and the latest information is that constitutional government has been re-established without bloodshed.

THE ITALIAN AFFAIR.

No Doubt but That the Matter Will Be Amicably Settled.

The lynching at New Orleans in March last of eleven men of Italian nativity by a mob of citizens was a most deplorable and discreditable incident. It did not, however, have its origin in any general animosity to the Italian people nor in any disrespect to the government of Italy, with which our relations were of the most friendly character. The fury of the mob was directed against these men as the supposed participants or accessories in the murder of a city official.

I do not allude to this as mitigating in any degree this offense against law and humanity, but only as affecting the international questions which grew out of it. It was once represented by the Italian minister that several of those whose lives had been taken by the mob were Italian subjects, and a demand was made for the punishment of the participants and for an indemnity to the families of those who were killed. It is to be regretted that the manner in which these claims were presented was not such as to promote a calm discussion of the questions involved, but this may well be attributed to the excitement and indignation which the crime naturally evoked. The views of this government as to its obligations to foreigners domiciled here were fully stated in the correspondence, as well as its purpose to make an investigation of the affair with the view to determine whether there were present any circumstances that could, under such rules of duty as we had indicated, create an obligation upon the United States. The temporary absence of a minister plenipotentiary of Italy at this capitol has hindered the further correspondence, but it is not doubted that a friendly conclusion is attainable.

THE TROUBLE WITH CHILI.

An Intimation That the Baltimore Affair Is Not Yet Settled.

The civil war in Chili, which began in January last, was continued, but fortunately with infrequent and not important armed collisions, until August 28, when the congressional forces landed near Valparaiso and, after a bloody engagement captured that city. President Balmaceda at once recognized that his cause was lost, and a provisional government was speedily established by the victorious party.

Our minister was promptly directed to recognize and put himself in communication with this government as soon as it should have established its de facto character, which was done.

THE BALTIMORE ASSAULT.

On the 16th of October an event occurred in Valparaiso so serious and tragic in its circumstances and results as to very justly excite the indignation of our people and to call for prompt and decided action on the part of this government. A considerable number of the sailors of the United States steamship Baltimore, then in the harbor of Valparaiso, being upon shore leave and unarmed, were assaulted by armed men nearly simultaneously in different localities in the city. One petty officer was killed outright and seven or eight seamen were seriously wounded, one of whom has since died. So savage and brutal was the assault that several of our sailors received more than two and one of them as many as eighteen stab wounds. An investigation of the affair was promptly made by a board of officers of the Baltimore, and their report shows that these assaults were unprovoked, that our men were conducting themselves in a peaceable and orderly manner, and that some of the police of the city took part in the assault and used their weapons with fatal effect, while a few others, with some well disposed citizens, endeavored to protect our men. Thirty-six of our sailors were arrested, and some of them, while being taken to prison, were cruelly beaten and maltreated. The fact that they were all discharged, no criminal charge being lodged against any one of them, shows very clearly that they were innocent of any breach of the peace.

So far as I have yet been able to learn no other explanation of this bloody work has been suggested than it had its origin in hostility to these men as sailors in the United States navy, wearing the uniform of their government, and not in any individual act or personal animosity. The attention of the Chilian government was at once called to this affair and a statement of the facts obtained by the investigation we had conducted was submitted, accompanied by a request to be advised of any other or qualifying facts in the possession of the Chilian government that might tend to relieve this affair of the appearance of an insult to this government. The Chilian government was also advised that if such qualifying facts did not exist this government would confidently expect full and prompt reparation.

It is to be regretted that the reply of the secretary for foreign affairs of the provisional government was couched in an offensive tone. To this no response has been made. This government is now awaiting the result of an investigation which has been conducted by the criminal court at Valparaiso. It is reported unofficially that the investigation is about completed, and it is expected that the result will soon be communicated to this government, together with some adequate and satisfactory response to the note by which the attention of Chili was called to this incident. If these just expectations should be disappointed or further needless delay intervene, I will, by a special message, bring this matter again to the attention of congress for such action as may be necessary. The entire correspondence with the government of Chili will at an early day be submitted to congress.

OUTBREAKS IN CHINA.

A Demand for the Protection of Citizens of the United States.

The late outbreak against foreigners in various parts of the Chinese empire has been a cause of deep pain in view of the numerous establishments of our citizens in the interior of that country. This government can do no less than insist upon a continuance of the protective and punitory measures which the Chinese government has heretofore applied. No effort will be omitted to protect our citizens peaceably sojourning in China, but recent unofficial information indicates that what was at first regarded as an outbreak of mob violence against foreigners has assumed the larger form of an insurrection against public order.

The Chinese government has declined to receive Mr. Blair as the minister of the United States on the ground that, as a participant, while a senator, in the enactment of the existing legislation against the introduction of Chinese laborers, he has become unfriendly and objectionable to China. I have felt constrained to point out to the Chinese government the untenableness of this position, which seems to rest as much on the unacceptability of our legislation as on that of the person chosen, and which, if admitted, would practically debar the selection of any representative so long as the existing laws remain in force.

You will be called upon to consider the expediency of making special provision by law for the temporary admission of some Chinese artisans and laborers in connection with the exhibit of Chinese industries, at the approaching Columbian exposition. I regard it as desirable that the Chinese exhibit be facilitated in every proper way.

EXPULSION OF JEWS.

A Friendly Kick to the Czar Against His Harsh Measures.

This government has found occasion to express, in a friendly spirit but with much earnestness, to the government of the czar its serious concern because of the harsh measures now being offered against the Hebrews in Russia. By the revival of anti-Semitic laws, long in abeyance, great numbers of those unfortunate people have been constrained to abandon their homes and leave the empire by reason of the impossibility of finding subsistence within the pale to which it is sought to confine them. The immigration of these people to the United States—many other countries being closed to them—is largely increasing, and is likely to assume proportions which may make it difficult to find homes and employment for them here and to seriously affect the labor market. It is estimated that over one million will be forced from Russia within a few years. The Hebrew is never a beggar; he has always kept the law—life by toil—often under severe and oppressive civil restrictions. It is also true that no race, sect or class has more fully cared for its own than the Hebrew race. But the sudden transfer of such a multitude, under conditions that tend to strip them of their small accumulations and to depress their energies and courage, is neither good for them nor for us.

The banishment, whether by direct decree or not less certain indirect methods, of so large a number of men and women is not a local question. A decree to leave one country is, in the nature of things, an order to enter another—some other. This consideration, as well as the suggestions of humanity, furnishes ample ground for the remonstrances which we have presented to Russia, while our historic friendship for that government cannot fail to give the assurance that our representations are those of a sincere well wisher.

THE TARIFF.

An Approval of the Results of the McKinley Bill.

The general interest in the operations of the treasury department has been much augmented during the last year by reason of the conflicting predictions which accompanied and followed the tariff and other legislation of the last congress affecting the revenue, as to the results of this legislation upon the treasury and upon the country. On the one hand, it was contended that imports would so fall off as to leave the treasury bankrupt, and that the prices of articles entering into the living of the people would be so enhanced as to disastrously affect their comfort and happiness; while, on the other, it was argued that the loss to the revenue, largely the result of placing sugar on the free list, would be a direct gain to the people; that the prices of the necessaries of life, including those most highly protected, would not be enhanced; that labor would have a larger market and the products advanced prices, while the treasury surplus and receipts would be adequate to meet the appropriations, including the large exceptional expenditures for the refunding to the states of the direct tax and the redemption of the 4½ per cent bonds.

It is not my purpose to enter at length into a discussion of the effects of the legislation to which I have referred; but a brief examination of the statistics of the treasury and a general glance at the state of business throughout the country will, I think, satisfy any impartial inquiry that its results have disappointed the evil prophecies of its opponents and in a large measure realized the hopeful predictions of its friends. Rarely, if ever before, in the history of the country has there been a time when the proceeds of one day's labor or the product of one farmed acre would purchase so large an amount of those things that enter into the living of the masses of the people. I believe that a full test will disclose the fact that the tariff act of the Fifty-first congress is very favorable in its average effect upon the prices of articles entering into common use.

During the twelve months from Oct. 1, 1890, to Sept. 30, 1891, the total value of our foreign commerce (imports and exports combined) was $1,747,806,406, which was the largest of any year in the history of the United States. The largest in any previous year was in 1890, when our commerce amounted to $1,647,139,093, and the last year exceeds this enormous aggregate by over one hundred millions. It is interesting, and to some will be surprising, to know that during the year, ending Sept. 30, 1891, our imports of merchandise amounted to $824,715,270, which was an increase of more than eleven million dollars over the value of imports of the corresponding months of the preceding year, when the imports of merchandise were unusually large in anticipation of the tariff legislation then pending. The average annual value of the imports of merchandise for the ten years from 1881 to 1890 was $692,186,522, and during the year ending Sept. 30, 1891, this annual average was exceeded by $132,528,169.

There is certainly nothing in the condition of trade, foreign or domestic; there is certainly nothing in the condition of our people of any class to suggest that the existing tariff and revenue legislation bears oppressively upon the people or retards the commercial development of the nation. It may be argued that our condition would be better if our tariff legislation were upon a free trade basis; but it cannot be denied that all the conditions of prosperity and of general contentment are present in a larger degree than ever before in our history, and that, too, just when it was prophesied they would be in the worst state. Agitation for radical changes in tariff and financial legislation cannot help, but may seriously impede, business, to the prosperity of which some degree of stability in legislation is essential. I think there are conclusive evidences that the new tariff has created several great industries which will, within a few years, give employment to several thousand American workingmen and women. In view of the somewhat crowded condition of the labor market of the United States, every patriotic citizen should rejoice at such a result.

THE FINANCES.

Facts Gleaned From the Secretary of the Treasury's Report.

The report of the secretary of the treasury shows that the total receipts of the government, from all sources, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, were $458,233,03, while the expenditures for the same period were $421,304,470.46, leaving a surplus of $37,239,762.57.

The receipts of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, actual and estimated, are $433,000,000 and the expenditures $409,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, the estimated receipts are $455,336,350 and the expenditures $441,300,093.

SILVER LEGISLATION.

An Urgent Appeal for a Fair Trial of the Present Law.

Before the influence of the prospective silver legislation was felt in the market silver was worth in New York about $0.955 per ounce. The ablest advocates of free coinage in the last congress were most confident in their prediction that the purchase by the government required by the law would at once bring the price of silver to $1.2929 per ounce, which would make the bullion value of a dollar 100 cents and hold it there.

I hope the oppression in the price of silver is temporary and that a further trial of this legislation will more favorably affect it. That the increased volume of currency thus supplied for the use of the people was needed and that beneficial results upon trade and prices have followed this legislation I think must be clear to every one; nor should it be forgotten that for every dollar of these notes issued a full dollar's worth of silver bullion is at the time deposited in the treasury as a security for its redemption. Upon this subject, as upon the tariff, my recommendation is that the existing laws be given a full trial and that our business interests be spared the distressing influence which threats of radical changes always impart. Under existing legislation it is in the power of the treasury department to maintain that essential condition of national finance as well as of commercial prosperity—the parity in use of the coin dollars and their paper representatives. The assurance that these powers would be freely and unhesitatingly used has done much to produce and sustain the present favorable business conditions. I am still of the opinion that under existing conditions would disastrously affect our business interests at home and abroad. We could not hope to maintain an equality in the purchasing power of the gold and silver dollar in our own markets, and in foreign trade the stamp gives no added value to the bullion contained in coins. The producers of the country, its farmers and laborers, have the highest interest that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the government, shall be as good as any other. If there is one less valuable than another, its sure and constant errand will be to pay them for their toil and for their crops. The money lender will protect himself by stipulating for payment in gold, but the laborer has never been able to do that. To place business upon a silver basis would mean a sudden and severe contraction of the currency, by the withdrawal of gold and gold notes, and such an unsettling of all values as would produce a commercial panic. I cannot believe that a people so strong and prosperous as ours will promote such a policy.

POSTAL AFFAIRS.

Recommendations for the Further Improvement of the Service.

In the report of the postmaster general some very gratifying results are exhibited and many betterments of the service suggested. A perusal of the report shows that an advance in the supervision and direction of the postal system has been characterized by an intelligent and conscientious desire to improve the service. The revenues of the department show an increase of over $5,000,000, while the estimates for the year 1893 show a surplus of receipts over expenditures.

THE NAVY.

Americans Want Peace, but War Vessels Are Necessary to Preserve It.

The report of the secretary of the navy shows a gratifying increase of new naval vessels in commission. The Newark, Concord, Bennington and Miantonomoh have been added during the year, with an aggregate of something more than 11,000 tons.

I commend to your favorable consideration the recommendations of the secretary who has, I am sure, given to them the most conscientious study. There should be no hesitation in promptly completing a navy of the best modern type, large enough to enable this country to display its flag in all seas for the protection of its citizens and of its extending commerce. The world needs no assurance of the peaceful purposes of the United States, but we shall probably be in the future more largely a competitor in the commerce of the world, and it is essential to the dignity of this nation, and to that peaceful influence which it should exercise on this hemisphere, that its navy should be adequate, both upon the shores of the Atlantic and of the Pacific.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

The Indian Problem Discussed and Recommendations Offered.

The report of the secretary of the interior shows that a very gratifying progress has been made in all of the bureaus which make up that complex, difficult department.

THE OUTBREAK AMONG THE SIOUX, which occurred in December last, is, as to its causes and incidents, fully reported upon by the war department and the department of the interior. That these Indians had some just complaints, especially in the matter of the reduction of the appropriation for rations and in the delays attending the enactment of laws to enable the department to perform the engagements entered into with them, is probably true; but the Sioux tribes are naturally warlike and turbulent, and their warriors were excited by their medicine men and chiefs, who preached the coming of an Indian messiah who was to give them power to destroy their enemies. In view of the alarm that prevailed among the white settlers near the reservation and of the fatalities which would have resulted from an Indian incursion, I placed at the disposal of Gen. Miles, commanding the division of the Missouri, all such forces as were thought by him to be required. He is entitled to the credit of having given thorough protection to the settlers and bringing the hostiles into subjection with the least possible loss of life.

I have been greatly rejoiced to notice many evidences of the increased unification of our people and of a revived national spirit. The vista that now opens to us is wider and more glorious than ever before. Gratification and amazement struggle for supremacy as we contemplate the population, wealth and moral strength of our country. A trust, momentous in its influence upon our people and upon the world is for a brief time committed to us, and we must not be faithless to its first condition—the defense of the free and equal influence of the people in the choice of public officers and in the control of public affairs.

At the meeting of the county commissioners Wednesday, it was decided to establish a county hospital and afterwards negotiations were completed whereby they purchased the three story frame building situated on the bank of the Red Lake River and known as the "Mansard." The consideration was $3,897.70, including most of the furniture. Possession is to be given on or before Jan. 15 and arrangements will at once be made for a matron and other things necessary for the carrying on of the institution. This county has long felt the need of a hospital of this kind and we think the action of the commissioners in this matter will meet with general approval especially when it is known that the property was purchased at half its original cost.

Washington D, C: Dec 12.—[Special.] Telegrams from Minister Egan anticipate, unofficially, the decision of the Chilian authorities. They intimate strongly that the reply will be far from satisfactory to this government.

This is a result anticipated for some time by the navy department. There is no doubt that the administration believes that a naval demonstration in Chilian waters will be necessary and that the navy department, anticipating such a result has made every effort to have all the available craft in a state of readiness when called upon.

For obvious reasons many things being done by the navy department are not made public but enough is known to indicate that the navy will be better prepared to meet emergencies than is generally supposed.

WHAT IS YOUR SON TO BE

A FIELD OFFERED BY THE GROWING ELECTRIC BUSINESS.

The Advance in Electricity Has Been So Rapid That It Has Progressed Faster Than the Intelligence Necessary to Handle It—Good Wages Paid.

Two men were sitting face to face between the car tracks on Park row the other day. It seemed to be a dangerous position, for they could not follow their work and at the same time keep their eyes on the rattling teams on either hand. They had to keep their elbows in too, or the cars would bump them. They were seated at a manhole, testing cables of wire which were in the subway beneath. Each had the end of a cable in hand and a portable galvanometer—a square box about the size of a cigar box—in front of him.

But a few years ago the man engaged in connecting wires in this way touched the tip of each wire in turn to the tip of his tongue. If there was a current running through the wire he felt a little pricking and a sour taste. He did this the whole day through, and was none the worse for receiving so many slight electric shocks and tasting so much copper.

It was a very primitive test, but a very good one, and old wire testers still use it when in a hurry. But soon a galvanometer was made, which not only finds the current but gives some idea of its strength. The rapid way in which invention has been piled upon invention in the electrical world is marvelous, and it seems surprising that a sufficient number of workmen of sufficient intelligence should be found in such a hurry to practically put these inventions into use.

A question upon this very point was put to a well known electrician who happened to saunter by the two men at work.

BAD WORK.

"It is only surprising in a measure," he said. "As a matter of fact, the business has grown much faster than the intelligence necessary to handle it, and many accidents are due to that fact. The electric light people at first had to rely very largely on the workmen engaged by the telegraph companies, and both had to draft in a large number of new men and train them to the work. Any man with a little knowledge of mechanics and the handling of tools soon makes a good lineman. There is no great skill required, except in care that the wire does not become abraded in handling, while the good wages paid for the work—seventy-five dollars a month—are a great inducement. But the business has undoubtedly suffered in its rapid progress for the want of skilled men and the market is by no means overstocked yet. Only the other day one of the New York companies had to send to the New England Cable company to borrow men to make joints in city lines.

"Some of the underground work, too, has been badly done, but much of this has been quite as much due to keen competition and the proverbial economy of the unscientific stockholders. When it comes to buying wire, costing from $1.400 to $1.500 a mile, the stockholder has a lot to say about it, and cheap wire is too often a result. One of the electric light companies runs an alternating current, and it now begins to find, all over the country, that its wires are already becoming faulty. They cannot stand the strain.

CHANCE FOR YOUNG MEN.

"One of the things absorbing the attention of electric men today is to find an insulator which will stand heavy alternating currents. So the trouble has been as much a matter of cheap material as unskilled labor."

"Have the workmen a union yet?"

"No, not yet. There is an association called the Society of Electrical Engineers."

"And where do the engineers and executive men come from?"

"A good many of the heads of departments have their training at the various schools of technology, such as the Stevens institute, Cornell university, the Massachusetts School of Technology. Indeed, nearly all the universities have classes in electricity now, and they supply a good deal of the talent for the business.

"These young fellows from the schools of technology have started in the blacksmith shop and worked right up, and the only thing about electrical matters they have no knowledge of is the business end of it. They easily find positions at from $80 to $100 a month at the start, and readily get more according to the ability they display.

"It is a great business for a man to get into, whether he is well educated or not. There is such an enormous field for the application of electric power outside of the electric light. See how fast the electric street cars have grown throughout the country! Then there are the other almost innumerable applications of the force which will soon be in demand. No, sir, the skilled workman who goes into the electric business, of whatever grade he may be, need feel no fears of his labor market being overcrowded."—New York Advertiser.

Lovers in Mackinac.

Mackinac is a perfect heaven for lovers. The Grand hotel has its front all dotted with little balconies, one to every other window and each strongly suggestive of the prettiest scene in "Romeo and Juliet." On a distant balcony I have seen a lovely girl appear to hold a long whispered conversation with her beau three times after leaving him for the night below stairs—once when she reached her room, again when she thought of another thing to say before disrobing, and yet again in her wrapper, after she had made herself otherwise ready for bed. And at that time there were other lovers talking from one balcony to another, others in the grove in front of the great hotel, others on the board walks leading to the village and still others, I doubt not, everywhere that the moon shone and the breezes fanned the island.—Julian Ralph in New York Sun.

MECHANICAL FLIGHT.

There Is a Possibility That Men Will Fly Through the Air Before Long.

Above us is the great aerial ocean, stretching over all lands, and offering an always open way to them, yet a way that has never yet been thus trodden. Can it be that the power we have always lacked is at last found, and that it only remains to learn to guide it?

Let me, in answering, compare the case to that which would present itself if the actual ocean had never been traversed because it was always covered with fields of thin ice, which gave way under foot, which indeed permitted vessels to be launched and to float, but which compelled them to move wherever the ice drifted. Such vessels would resemble our balloons, and be of as little practical use; but now suppose we were told. "The ice which has always been your obstacle may be made your very means of transport, for you can glide over the thinnest ice, provided you only glide fast enough, and experiments will prove not only how fast you must go to make the ice bear, but that it is quite within the limits of your strength to go with the requisite speed."

All this might be true, and yet, if no one had ever learned to skate, every trial of this really excellent plan would probably end in disaster, as all past efforts to fly have done. Indeed, in our actual experience with the air, men have come to the same kind of wrong conclusion as would have been reached in supposing that the ice could not be traversed, because no one had the strength to skate, while the truth would be that man has plenty of strength to skate, but is not born with the skill.

The simile is defective so far as it suggests that man can sustain himself by his unaided strength on calm air, which I believe to be impracticable, but it is the object of experiments to prove that he has now the power to sustain himself with the aid of engines recently constructed as soon as he has the skill to direct them.

If asked whether a method of flight will soon be put in practice, I should have to repeat that what has preceded is matter of demonstration, but that this is matter of opinion. Expressing then, a personal opinion only, I should answer, "Yes." It is hardly possible that the secondary difficulties will not be soon conquered by the skill of our inventors and engineers, whose attention is already beginning to be drawn to the fact that here is a new field open to them, and though I have not experimented far enough to say that the relations of power to weight established for small machines will hold for indefinitely large ones, it is certain they do so hold, at any rate far enough to enable us to transport, at speeds which make us practically independent of the wind, weights much greater than that of a man.

Progress is rapid now, especially in invention, and it is possible—it seems to me even probable—that before the century closes we shall see this universal road of the all embracing air, which recognizes none of man's boundaries, traveled in every direction, with an effect on some of the conditions of our existence which will mark this among all the wonders the century has seen.—S. P. Langley in Century.

A Remarkable Deaf Mute.

One of the most remarkable inmates of the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb is Richard Clinton, who, though deaf, dumb and blind, has in the fourteen years he has spent in the asylum acquired an education and a self supporting trade. He was born in Dublin with the senses of sight and hearing perfect. One eye was destroyed in childhood by an explosion, and an attack of scarlet fever cost him the other eye and his hearing.

He was for a time in a school for deaf mutes in Ireland, but it was not until he entered the New York institution that he derived benefit from the instruction given him. Here he has been taught the ordinary branches of education and has acquired the trade of bottoming chairs. He learned to write by using a rule to guide his hand. Of late he has learned to use the typewriter and has discarded the pen.

Clinton uses the sign language in conversation, and reads the replies of his companions by touching their hands. His touch is abnormally sensitive, as is often the case with the blind. By touching the hand of a friend he recognizes the person, and he recalls an old acquaintance from whom he has been long separated by feeling his face, hands and form.

The other boys in the institution treat Clinton in their play as roughly as if he had sight. He never resents such treatment. He is only angered when he is pitied. When he is pushed he recognizes the persons attacking him by the manner in which they touch him. Many tricks have been played upon him, but it rarely happens that he gets caught twice by the same trick.—New York World.

Affected Locomotion.

Grace lends a fascination to an ordinary figure which the most symmetrical proportions cannot exercise without it. But unfortunately a great many ladies entertain mistaken ideas as to what constitutes the poetry of motion. Neither the demonstrative swing nor the high tragedy gait with which some of our Hebes and Junos endeavor to show off their different styles of person approximate it at all. The tall and stately creature with trailing garments who moves, or tries to move, as if she trod on necks and liked that sort of pavement is not nearly so Junolike as she may think. Such styles of going are affectations; and affectations of every kind are an abomination to people of correct taste. A lady should neither amble nor strut, but glide along as if unconscious that anybody was looking at her. Walking should be an unstudied act, not a performance. All the world is not a stage, in the common acceptance of the term, nor is it necessary that ladies should tread in streets like tragedy queens, or genteel comedy misses, or skipping soubrettes.—New York Ledger.

A Big Yield.

C. H. Bullock, of Northfield, Minn., has obtained 1,120 bushels of potatoes from one acre of land. This is said to be by far the largest yield ever known, 300 bushels being usually considered a big crop. That the 1,120 bushels were all raised on one acre of ground is sworn to by a number of trustworty people of the vicinity. Mr. Bullock will net $336 for his product, nearly all clear gain. Last year he would have made $600 off the same yield, as the price of potatoes was high then. The farmers in the vicinity are considering these figures and thinking of potatoes a good deal.—New York Sun.

WANTED--A BURGLAR.

THE STRANGE STORY OF A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.

BY J. WEBSTER BAYNES.

CHAPTER VII—CONTINUED.

On the following and for many succeeding days the lessons in lock picking went steadily on. "B. 148" was indefatigable in her studies, her determination and patience arousing the silent admiration of her instructor. Daily intercourse, though it had to a great extent broken down the reserve of their first meetings, had done nothing to throw the slightest light upon the motives of the lady for her curious proceedings; nor with the exception of having obtained some insight into her personal character, did he know more of her history or position than he did on the day when he met her opposite the Angel. Her earnestness, however, had imbued him with some of her own enthusiasm, and he strove loyally to impart to her the exceptional knowledge and skill he possessed. He fitted up with locks in her absence, all the boxes, drawers and cupboards in his workshop for her to practice upon, and the progress she made was remarkable. One day, before leaving Lorne-street for home, she handed a small bunch of keys to him, saying, with a smile, "Will you take care of these, Mr. Leighton? I have locked up all my belongings, and I shall do without them until I can get at them in true burglar fashion."

The young man looked at her with a start, then said quietly, "You have discovered my name I see," with an emphasis on the "my."

"Oh, yes," she replied, blushing, "but I assure you I have not been prying. There was an envelope in one of the books you lent me, addressed to Mr. John Leighton, Lorne street, and I concluded at once it could but be your name. The discovery was quite accidental; I hope you are not annoyed."

"Not in the slightest, madam; I am not ashamed of my name; but should I be wrong if I reminded you that now you have the advantage of me," replied the young man, looking at her with a smile.

"Not now, not now," she said, appealingly, "some time I will tell you my name and my reasons for all this strange undertaking, but not now; do not ask me, please."

"I trust I am your obedient servant at all times," was his only answer, as he let her out into the lane, and not another word was spoken between them until he bade her good night at the cabstand, to which he regularly conducted her.

CHAPTER VIII.

EXPLANATIONS.

The following day, when she turned up at the usual hour, she was fain to confess that her home efforts at amateur burglary had not been successful as a whole. Some few locks she had been able to pick, but others had not only defied her attempts, but she had evidently so ruined them that they would require renewing. John Leighton, though rather amused at this result, still felt considerably chagrined. For some time he had realised that his pupil, persevering and diligent as she was, and intentively as she appeared to take up and understand the theory of locks and lock-making, could not acquire the mechanical power or adroitness so necessary in the manipulation of counterfeit keys. When it became requisite to bend afresh, or straighten, or otherwise alter the shape of a key, therein she signally failed.

It was not only a case of want of practical knowledge, but also of strength. Assured of this, as he had been for some time, John Leighton could not bring himself to tell his pupil that his lessons might avail her nothing. He had come to look—even in so short a time—upon those daily meetings as something so material to his everyday life that the thought of breaking the thread of its routine jarred upon him in a way he could not quite understand. He felt in duty bound to tell her that, after all, the probabilities were that he could not give her the power over locks, bolts, and bars that he himself possessed; but somehow the conviction that by so doing he would sever for ever the connecting link between them—that with the knowledge of her incompetence to fully master the details she so much desired there would end those pleasant hours of contact and friendly intercourse which had become to him the sunshine of his life—tied his tongue, and he felt that to let matters drift in their own way was perhaps best. On this morning, however, when "B 148" came into the workshop with a half-pouting half-amused look upon her face, complaining of her want of success in her home efforts, his head somehow obtained the mastery over his heart, and he rather bluntly told her that unless she had more practical knowledge of the manipulation of tools she could never hope to remodel and alter effectively the false keys necessary for the attainment of her object. This plain statement took her back, and she somewhat indignantly demanded that she should be shown in what especially she was deficient. While John Leighton was endeavoring to explain what he meant, she took off her bonnet rather irritably, and was proceeding to lay aside her cloak, when by some unfortunate chance it caught a heavy bar of metal which was laid on the workbench, and which fell with crushing force upon her foot. A sharp cry of agony burst from her lips, and the next instant "B 148" was sitting on the dusty floor, struggling desperately with her boot.

"Oh," she cried piteously, "I cannot undo the lace—cut it; do anything; but do please help me with it off."

John Leighton was down on his knees in an instant, and taking the wounded foot in his hand, he slit the lace without ceremony from top to bottom, and withdrawing the boot as gently as possible he held the prettiest little foot it had ever been his lot to look upon. He had hardly time to realize this and to note that the delicate dove-colored stocking was stained with blood, when he became aware from the stillness, and the dropping of a nerveless white hand upon his arm that something further had occurred, and glancing up quickly he found that his pupil had fainted. Now this was a rather embarrassing matter to cope with for any man, but for John Leighton it was doubly so. In the first place, he was not very well posted as far as women and their ways, or their weaknesses went. His experience of the sex was almost nil. In the second place, he felt that other help than his was imperative, but where was he to obtain it? He did not even know the lady's name: and how could he explain the nature of her business connection with him?

For an instant John Leighton hesitated; but a look at that pale, deathlike face, resting with closed eyelids and parted lips against the coarse oaken bench, and the sight of that innocent-looking little foot, from which the crimson blood was slowly welling, nerved him to action. He realized with a rush of feeling that he loved this unknown mysterious woman, whose life's lines had so strangely mingled with his own. Loved her honestly and purely, without any sure hope of reward or return. He loved her as he had never loved any one before; and the thought of how dear to him she was, though he to her might be nothing, strengthened him, and forgetting all else, he took her up in his strong arms as though she had been a weary child. Guarding tenderly that poor, maimed foot, he carried her lovingly from the workshop, across the little garden to the house, and finding the door on the chain, he burst it open with an ease which astonished him afterwards, and which alarmed the little servant maid almost to screaming point; and stalking past her without vouchsafing further word than, "Bring my mother down at once," he laid his precious burden on the sofa, in the little front sitting room, and then fell to chafing her small hands in his own strong brown ones with a tenderness scarcely to be expected from such a muscular specimen of humanity.

Whilst thus engaged a tall grey-haired old lady, who walked with difficulty, entered the room, and putting her hand on his shoulder, said softly, "John, who is this, and what is the matter?"

"Mother," he replied, rising, "help her, she has met with an accident; help her; I don't know what to do; but mother, you know I would not ask you to do what was not right."

"John," replied the lady, putting him on one side as she spoke, "you can trust me, I always trust you; now run away Sally and I can look after this lady;" then John found himself quietly ignored, whilst his mother, with womanly instinct, took full charge of the death-like figure on the sofa.

When, after applications of smelling salts, cold water, and other homely remedies, the lady known as "B 148" recovered from her fainting fit, and wearily opened her eyes, her glance fell on a restful, motherly face, framed in soft bands of white hair, which soothed and comforted with a power which seemed to be angelic in its force.

"Where am I? Who are you?" said the injured lady.

"I am John's mother, Mrs. Leighton," was the reply.

"John's mother! What John?" It was some time before she realized who the old lady referred to, then a sudden flood of recollection burst upon her—"John, John Leighton, the "J. L." of the advertisement, the workshop, the accident"—it all came back to her now. "How did I get here?" she asked after a pause.

"Oh, John carried you," replied his mother, rather proudly; "but you must take a little port wine, and then I will look at your foot, which I'm afraid is badly hurt."

"Carried me! He must be very strong," she said, more to herself than Mrs. Leighton, and then she resigned herself to the wine and the examination with a troubled look in her eyes that roused the sympathy of her nurse.

The injury was no light one, the foot being badly cut and brused; and as it was extremely painful and swelling rapidly, Mrs. Leighton insisted upon calling in a doctor. The medical verdict when obtained was to the effect that the upper tendons of the foot were badly crushed and that it would be a matter of some days at least before any attempt at using it could be made, and, in the meantime, absolute rest was necessary, as any irritation would only add to the difficulty of cure.

The sufferer appealed vigorously against this decision, but the doctor was firm, and Mrs. Leighton insisting that it would be no inconvenience to place the sitting room, or even a bedroom at her disposal, and to take a share in nursing her, she at length consented to send for her maid and remain where she was until such time as removal would be less dangerous.

This unlooked-for imprisonment chafed the lady's spirits almost unbearably, and Mrs. Leighton warned her that if she was not careful she would work herself into a fever. This advice did not allay her anxiety, but decided her upon action.

"Could I see your son, Mrs. Leighton? I must speak to him on business. You won't mind, will you?" she said entreatingly.

"Mind!" said the old lady smiling, "of course I don't mind. I'll send in John at once," which she did after finding him moodily pacing the back garden, pipe in mouth.

"Mr. Leighton, I must have some talk with you, if you will allow me," began "B 148" earnestly. "It is not right that I should be under this roof with your mother, unknown by name to her or you. I am—but, before I tell you who I am, might I ask you a few questions? You are no burglar, nor do you belong to the criminal classes; of that I feel convinced: What motive had you, then, in replying to my advertisement?"

John Leighton stood with his arm resting on the chimneypiece, his eyes fixed on the pale, pained face resting on the soft sofa pillows, with a strange, rapt look in them as of one awakened from a dream. He had been dreaming for some time, but that day he had suddenly awakened to the fact that he was in love; desperately in love with this unknown woman who had so strangely crossed the uneventful path of his life. The discovery had disturbed him greatly, and he somehow did not feel at ease in her presence yet. For a moment he hesitated as to his answer, then as he noted the earnestness of her gaze, he answered abruptly—

"Curiosity;" then, after a pause, seeing she was waiting for a further explanation, he continued, "Yes, it was curiosity in the first place. You are right in your judgment of me in so far as that I do not, nor never have, belonged to the criminal classes. How I came to answer your advertisement was in this way. Some weeks ago, whilst walking along Finsbury Pavement, I noticed a slip of paper drop from a boy's hand. I picked it up and followed him. I saw it was a slip from a newspaper office; it was marked 'B. 148.' I gave it to the boy, who took it without thanking me, saying mysteriously as he did so, 'It's a good job you gave me that, it belongs to The Countess.' 'And who is The Countess?' I asked. 'Do not, at your peril, attempt to discover the secret,' he replied trying to look fierce, and with a wave of his hand he took to his heels. He was a funny lad, and I've often wondered who and what he was. Two days afterwards I noticed your advertisement in the paper, the number 'B 148' striking me at once. I puzzled over it for some time, wondering what a 'countess' could have to do with such a business, and at length, out of curiosity, I answered it, with the result you know of."

The lady could not restrain her laughter at the description of her messenger's behavior.

"He is a strange boy," she said; "I believe they call him "The Imp," in the neighborhood. He is always imagining himself to be one of the characters in a story book, and he often acts in the most absurd manner; but I did not know he had dubbed me Countess."

"One thing more, madame, if you will allow me," broke in John Leighton. "If I complete my explanation it may give you more confidence in us, and ease your mind as to your perfect security whilst in this house with us. My father, after whom I am named, was a partner in the firm of Mearns, Morse, and Lock, the great safemakers. He was the inventor of most of the combinations now used in safe locks. It was under him that I received my training. At his death, through some flaw in the agreements or partnership deeds, his share in the business ceased, and rather than accept a managership I left and settled here for a time with my mother. Now you know all about us, and I trust you will have no fear as to your safety or treatment."

"Mr. Leighton, I have none," and "B 148" held out her hand to the young man, the more to emphasise her confidence; and John Leighton took it with a pleased flush on his cheek, and a curious thrill of happiness permeating his system.

He knew there was an explanation coming, but somehow he did not care to hear it; he dreaded it indeed. For the moment he was contented and happy, but his dream was soon broken by the soft voice of his strange employer.

"I am Mrs. Duncan, Mrs. Paul Duncan, of Elmsfold, Draftshire," she said, as he released her hand, and at the utterance of the word John Leighton's heart seemed to chill strangely, and his eye lost its brightness.

But not heeding, in fact not knowing this, Mrs. Duncan proceeded quietly, lucidly, and minutely to tell the story of the mysterious disappearance of her husband, of the futile efforts made to discover him or learn his fate, of the strange clue obtained at Nant Gwern, and her own so far useless endeavors to follow it up and unravel the secret. Then she told further how she had come to the conclusion that in some hidden safe or holdfast chest, or locked and firmly guarded cupboard, in the old library at Nant Gwern would be found that which would give the history of her husband's disappearance.

HIS FATHER A "BEARDED LADY."

Roland Reed's Latest Story About a Too Communicative Boy.

In a certain New York public school there was a particularly bad youngster who, for narrative purposes, may be known as Smith. A peculiarity attaching to Smith was that he seemed to have no home, and though the other boys frequently trailed him in the most approved detective fashion they could never succeed in locating the Smithsonian domicile.

The same cloud of mystery which enveloped Smith's home enshrouded his family. He never spoke of them, and as far as appearances went was a lone orphan without kith or kin, so the belief soon became general that there was a terrible secret hidden away somewhere in Smith's young life.

One day during the morning session the mysterious youth in a spirit of unwonted sportivness, caused his deskmate acute personal discomfort through the medium of a pin bent in traditional manner. He was taken red-handed and haled before the principal. Smith," remarked that august personage, "you will have to take a letter from me to your father at once, informing him of your bad behavior. Where can he be found?"

He of the bent pin answered with a wail of despair.

"One second to tell me, or—" and the principal poised his nice new rattan.

"I can't tell you out loud," howled Smith, "an I won't; I don't care if you do lick me."

"Then you my whisper it."

The principal inclined his ear and Smith gasped therein this single line.

"Pa's a bearded lady in the dime museum."

The skeleton had escaped from the closet.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

CURIOUS CURES.

A gentleman was suffering from an ulcerated sore throat, which finally became so swollen that his life was despaired of. When his household came to his bedside to bid him farewell, each person grasped his hand for a moment and then turning, went out weeping. A pet ape, which had modestly waited till the last, then advanced and grasped his master's hand for a minute, also turned and went away with his hands to his eyes. This assumption of deep grief, which is hardly possible the animal could have really felt, was so ludicrous in its perfection, that the sick man was seized with an uncontrollable fit of laughter which broke the ulcer in his throat, whereby his life was saved.

The great Erasmus laughed so violently while reading the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum, letter of obscure men against the monks, that he broke an imposthume and saved his life.

A somewhat similar story is related of rhe celebrated grammarian, Urbain Domergue, who had an abscess on his throat, which broke in a fit of passion with which he fell on his physician for commiting a solecism in grammer.

Rey. George Harvest, rector of Thames Ditton, England, was very absent-minded, so that on one occasion he went into a friend's house, and seeing no servant, he rambled over it, finally entering a room of an old lady ill of quinsy. He stumbled over a clothes-horse and in his awkardness made the patient burst into such a fit of laughter that the quinsy broke and she lived many years to thank him.—American Notes and Queries.

HOW A JEW CAN FIND A JEW.

The Queer Customs That Enables One to Locate the Home of Another.

A certain class of Jewish peddlers desire only to deal with people of their own race. They visit the houses of the poorer quarters of the city, where Jews live side by side with Germans, Swedes, Bohemians, Poles, Irish, and others, yet they never knock at the door of a room where other than a Jew resides.

How do they do this? Their certainty is due to a simple cause—not known to the Gentile—which dates back to the time when history was young. The Jewish Biblical story says that Moses instructed his followers to keep green the memory of their departure from Egypt by marking their houses so that they could be distinguished from those of the Gentiles. The last curse sent to Pharaoh's people was the slaughter of first-borns. The Jews marked their doors with lambs' blood, and the Destroying Angel passed by the doors so marked. This and the Biblical injunction led to a custom among the orthodox Jews which is followed to the present day. On the door-frame at the entrance to every Jewish house there is nailed a little tin box, generally three or four inches long and one-half or a whole inch wide. It is usually placed six or seven feet from the ground, and in it rolled a piece of parchment containing the passage from the Bible referred to.

Not only is this placed at the entrance to the home, but the door-frame of every room is adorned with one of the sacred emblems. Extremely orthodox Jews touch the object and kiss their finger-tips every time they pass beneath it. In portions of Europe where the jews are less modern than here the little tin boxes are placed at the outer entrance of the houses, but here it is the custom to nail them on the inner portion of the door-frames.

And it is by looking behind the street door that the Jewish-peddler can tell whether or not one of his coreligionists dwells within the house.—Chicago Tribune.

A QUEER BIRTHMARK.

Born With a Mark Over His Heart Resembling a Bullet Wound.

A curious story comes from Salt Lake City, Utah, which is attracting much attention from friends and acquaintances of Policeman Charles F. Wanless, shot and killed by Joseph A. Barnes, on September 18th, 1890, and may furnish medical men with another subject for discussion. Barnes, it will be remembered, was having a quarrel with his wife, which the officer attempted to stop. Barnes fired and the bullet passed through Wanless' heart, leaving a jagged bullet hole in the breast.

A married sister of the dead officer was telegraphed and came from her home in Salt Lake. She was much affected by the tragedy and took the loss of her brother to heart. In a short time she returned home. About three months ago, as the report is heard here by the friends of the dead officer, his sister gave birth to a boy, perfectly formed, but with a red birth mark over the heart the exact shape and appearance of the wound made in Wanless' breast by the bullet from Barnes' pistol.—Denver News.

Glass in Old Egypt.

"The glass-blowers of Thebes were as great proficients in their art as, possibly greater than, we are after the lapse of forty centuries of progress and retrogression. They possessed the art of staining glass, and they produced the commodity in the utmost profusion: Rosellini gives an illustration of a piece of stained glass of considerable taste of design and beauty of color, in which the color is struck through the whole vitrified structure, and there are instances of the design being equally struck through pieces of glass half an inch thick, perfectly incorporated with the structure, and appearing the same on both the obverse and the reverse side.

"The priests of P'tah at Memphis were great glass-makers, and, says one authority, 'not only had factories for common glass, but, profiting by their discovery of the property of oxides of metals, which they got from India, of vitrifying different colors, conceived the project of imitating all precious stones which commerce brought them from that country'.

"They were favored by nature, moreover in having at hand an unlimited supply of pure sand and kale, and their glass derived its good quality as well as from these substances as from the farther fact that in its preperation they utilized the ashes of a peculiar genus of kelp that grew in abundance by Lake Mareotis and the red sea. They imitated amethysts and other precious stones with wonderful dexterity, and besides the art of staining glass, they must have been aware of the use of the use of the diamond in cutting it and engraving it; for in the British Meuseum there is a piece of exquisitely stained glass, of the time of Thothmes III. (circa 1500 B. C.), skillfully engraved with that monarch's emblazonment by the hand of a master."—Chambers' Journal.

To Preserve Eggs.

The egg begins to grow stale almost as soon as it is laid, and the cause of many failures to preserve eggs perfectly fresh says the Farmers' Monthly, is found in the fact that decay set in before the preserving began, and of course it continued in spite of efforts to arrest it. In preserving eggs, therefore take none but those fresh from the nest. This is the first rule to observe. The next is, no matter what you use, keep the preserved eggs in the coolest dry place possible; dampness will mould them, heat will readily evaporate their natural moisture, and any process, which will keep them absolutely air tight will keep them fresh for an indefinite length of time. Among the countless methods is this one: Take five quarts of rock salt; five unslacked lime, and a quarter of a pound of cream of tartar; dissolve in four pails of water, which makes sufficient pickle for a barrel of eggs. Eggs are always kept under pickle.

"August Flower"

What Is It For?

This is the query perpetually on your little boy's lips. And he is no worse than the bigger, older, balder-headed boys. Life is an interrogation point. "What is it for?" we continually cry from the cradle to the grave. So with this little introductory sermon we turn and ask: "What is AUGUST FLOWER FOR?" As easily answered as asked: It is for Dyspepsia. It is a special remedy for the Stomach and Liver. Nothing more than this; but this brimful. We believe August Flower cures Dyspepsia. We know it will. We have reasons for knowing it. Twenty years ago it started in a small country town. To-day it has an honored place in every city and country store, possesses one of the largest manufacturing plants in the country and sells everywhere. Why is this? The reason is as simple as a child's thought. It is honest, does one thing, and does it right along—it cures Dyspepsia. ⊗

HIS SINGLE THOUGHT.

An Old Physician's Experience With a Mother's Darling.

"Speaking of the ruling passion, strong in death," said one of New York's swell physicians recently, "I met an odd example of it a short time ago. In a family wherein I have a couple of regular patients there is a small boy who has lived four brief but exciting years. I have no hesitation in saying that he is absolutely the worst child I ever met. His ingenuity in all forms of infantile misbehavior is marvelous, and, left to himself, he can devise an endless number of unique ways for getting into hot water. About two months ago he began an open warfare on the grand piano which stands in his parents' parlor. He filled the legs of this unfortunate instrument full of dents, and then began to rip the ivory coverings from its keys whenever occasion offered. His delight in this was deep rooted and all absorbing.

A sudden change in the weather, however, laid this incorrigible infant l — with a first-class attack of pneumonia, and the piano was given a rest and a chance to recuperate. One evening I came to the conclusion that there was no hope of the child's life and as tenderly as possible conveyed that fact to his parents, who for five days had never left his bedside. In a spasm of grief the mother lifted the boy from the bed and hysterically clasped him to her bosom. That action saved his life. The shock set the blood, which clogged his lungs, in circulation again, and another possibility of saving him materialized. As I was hastily giving my orders for some medicines that would be needed at once the boy's eyes opened languidly and he looked around the room with an expression of unutterable weariness.

"Give him anything," I cried, "anything he wants!"

A gleam of interest shot into those tired eyes and the weakest of voices piped:

"Please, mamma, can I keep on bustin' the piano?"—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Christmas in Poland.

It is customary in Polish villages to strew straw over the Christmas eve supper tables, and for the young people, blind-fold or in the dark, to pick out each a straw therefrom. Should the straw be green, the lucky maiden expects to wear a bridal wreath, or the youth to lead a blushing bride to the altar during the approaching year; but a dried straw foretells to either long waiting, possibly even until death.

In other rural Polish districts, on the "Christ's Eve," wine, beer, and water are placed by a girl between two candles on a table. She then retires into a corner or an adjoining room to watch the result reflected in a mirror hung for this purpose. If as the clock strikes midnight, a man enters and drinks the wine, she is happy, for her wooer will be rich. Should he drink the beer, she may be content, for the wooer will be "well-to-do." If the water be chosen, her husband will be very poor. But if, as the clock strikes, no man comes to her table, the anxious maiden shivers with more than midnight terror, believing that she is doomed to be early the bride of Death.

Poland is peculiarly rich in these observances, spreading themselves throughout the year, both sexes being equally superstitious in this respect. On New Year's Eve the unmarried men place themselves before a fire, and bending down look beneath their legs. Should a woman appear in the background, it is the one they will marry; but if they see a shape as of a coffin, it forbodes for them death during the year close at hand.—Chambers' Journal.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria,
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria,
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria,
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

Points of Similarity.

Student (to young mother with baby in her arms) "A child is a very helpless sort of creature during the first twelve months, is it not, Madame?"

Mother: Well, yes. It deports itself very much like a student in his first term."

Student: In what way?"

Mother: It does nothing but drink, scream and sleep."—Der Schalk.

The man who is laboring under a misapprehension should secure a new situation.

The Paris Figaro has just published an interesting article on "What Young Girls Should Read." This is all well enough. But it is more important still to know that they should always take Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup for their colds.

Paradoxically, a man is never troubled with homesickness until he leaves there.

Floored,

Dyspepsia is speedily floored by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, purest, pleasantest of stomachics, most effective of tonics. Heartburn, flatulence, the "sinking" sensation in the pit of the stomach experienced by dyspeptics, in brief, all symptoms—and they are many and perplexing—of indigestion are banished by the Bitters, which is particularly efficacious for biliousness, malaria, rheumatism and kidney complaints.

WANTED--A BURGLAR.

THE STRANGE STORY OF A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.

BY J. WEBSTER BAYNES.

CHAPTER VIII—Continued.

As John Leighton listened to the strange recital the light in his eye brightened, hardened, and his muscular hands worked restlessly.

When Mrs. Duncan finished speaking, he asked, in a rather brusque way, one or two questions as to details; amongst others, if he might see the few fragments she had picked up from the ashes in Nant Gwern library.

Mrs. Duncan's pale cheeks colored hopefully as she answered him. Somehow the feeling came strongly upon her, that, in the man before her she would find help and credence, and that she might trust in him for good advice and counsel, if not for more. All she could tell she did. She racked her memory to recall the slightest details, and she sent at once for the few small scraps she had secured from the library hearth at Nant Gwern.

On the following morning Mrs. Leighton told her lady patient that she could not understand John at all. He had risen early, packed his portmanteau, and bidden her good-bye, saying he had to go away on business, and might not be back for some days. He had wished her to tell Mrs. Duncan that he would think over her business while away, and in his absence she must set her mind upon getting well as soon as possible. That was all he would say, and Mrs. Leighton could not understand it at all. John had never done such a thing before.

The good old lady omitted to add that he borrowed ten pounds from her before starting, but then this was a a family business only.

As for Mrs Duncan, she lay puzzling over the matter for some time, but at length concluded to take the advice given, and get better as soon as possible.

CHAPTER IX.

THROUGH BOLTS AND BARS.

John Leighton had been away from home five days, and no word had been heard of him or from him. His mother was in deep distress of mind at his strange and unwonted conduct, but she did not want to show any lack of confidence in her boy by talking of it. Mrs. Duncan, too, who was able to move about by the aid of a stick, was greatly troubled. She had stayed with Mrs. Leighton at the latter's earnest entreaty, and also because, in the absence of her son, she felt that she owed it to her kindly hostess to be with her in his absence.

On the sixth day John's mother entered the room appropriated to her guest in a flurried manner, exclaiming, rather plaintively. "Really, Mrs. Duncan, I do not know what to make of my son. Here I've a letter from him dated from Oswestry, which I suppose is somewhere on the Welsh border, but I'm not quite sure, in which he says: 'That he is well and hopes to finish his business in a few days, when he will return at once.' He wants me to send him on more money, and I'm sure he'd plenty when he went away; and he sends his kind regards to you, and says he hopes your foot is better, as he trusts to continue his business satisfactorily with you when he returns. I never could understand what you could be wanting him to teach you all about locks and such things for; but for him to run off to an outlandish place like this Oswestry for is more mysterious still. It's not like my John at all," and the old lady sat down breathlessly, and began to wipe her spectacles with her handkerchief in a tremulous way, which was touching.

Mrs. Duncan started at the mention of Oswestry. She had guessed that John Leighton's absence might in some way be connected with her own affairs, but that he should visit Glen Ogwen she had not imagined. What more could he do than she had done, she wondered; but somehow the knowledge that he was there working on her behalf cheered her up wonderfully.

"Oh, Mrs. Leighton, I'm sure it will be all right; you surely are not going to doubt your son, are you? As for the money, you must let me take that matter upon myself. I owe him some, and should have paid him before I left had I seen him, so please leave that to me. I must go out a drive to-day, I feel to need one so much, and I can post your letter for you and enclose a draft."

Of course Mrs. Leighton asseverated, as mothers will, that she had every confidence in her son; but with regard to the money she was firm. She was asked for it, and from her it should be sent; any matters between John and Mrs. Duncan could be settled afterwards. From this decision she would not depart; and having written a long letter of good advice to her boy —as she would call him—she entrusted five pounds to her invalid guest, who had meantime ordered a conveyance for a drive, to be forwarded to Oswestry. To this amount, however, Mrs. Duncan took the liberty of adding twenty pounds and enclosing a short note which she signed—"Yours ever faithfully, Ellen Duncan," and in which she begged for information as to his proceedings.

Fully a week elapsed without further word from Oswestry, and the time passed slowly for those waiting for news; but one evening a hearty voice was heard at the house door, and John Leighton laughingly made his way to his mother's small back parlor, and dutifully received a maternal scolding for his prolonged and unaccountable absence. This done, and peace made over a cup of tea and a chop, he asked to see Mrs. Duncan, who was only too anxious to see him, for she had heard his voice and was impatiently waiting for his news.

As she welcomed him her hand trembled a little, and her face flushed, but her voice was firm.

"I am glad to see you home again, Mr. Leighton," she said, "more glad than perhaps you know of. What you have been doing I cannot say, but that you have been working on my behalf I feel assured. Have you good or bad news for me?"

For the moment John Leighton hesitated, the thought of rising in his mind that what to her might be good news, to him would be the opposite: then he said gently—

"Mrs. Duncan, I cannot answer that as yet. I have simply convinced myself that your theory as to the clue to the secret of Mr. Duncan's disappearance being contained in a safe in the library at Nant Gwern is correct. How have I come to this conclusion you will ask? Well, I will tell you. I have discovered one of the masons who built that safe into the wall of the room, and who afterwards bricked it up; and more than that, I procured from him this," and putting his hand into his waistcoat pocket, he drew out a turquoise breast-pin, which he handed to Mrs. Duncan.

A glance sufficed to show that it had originally been a solitaire, that the inscription upon the gold mount was identical with the one upon the solitaire found by the jackdaw at Nant Gwern, namely, "Ellen to Paul." Mrs. Duncan's hand trembled as she examined it, but, without speaking, she motioned for Leighton to proceed.

"It was for this I wrote for money, which, I doubt not, came from you, but I could not be particular at the time. I bought it from the mason, and then charged him with having stole it from Mr. Capesthorne's place. After some firmness, he confessed the truth, saying that he had found it at Nant Gwern; and on the strength of this I got full details as to the safe, with the exception of its contents. I know its make, and size, and strength, its exact place in the library wall, and also that the lock cannot be picked."

"How do you know its position in the wall, and why cannot the lock be picked?" broke in Mrs. Duncan.

"The lock was destroyed when the safe was walled in, and I know the exact position, having visited the room by way of the window, and examined for myself. I did a little amateur burglary business. I must act up to my character you know," and John Leighton smiled grimly at his own joke.

"Oh! Mr. Leighton, what a risk you ran. You should not have done this; you might have been arrested," said Mrs. Duncan in an agitated manner; "besides, what good has it done us? You say that the lock of the safe cannot be picked; therefore, so far as I can see, our position is not advanced one whit, and all my lessons have been of no avail."

"That, Mrs. Duncan," replied John Leighton rather sternly, "is, if you will allow me, a matter of opinion. I have ideas regarding this business which I think are workable. I suppose I should counsel you to apply to the law and ask for a warrant to search Nant Gwern, but with the slight evidence you possess, and in the absence of the owner, I much doubt if it would be granted. No, what must be done, must be done secretly, surreptitiously if you like; we must fight with the weapons with which you have been fought. Unlawful ones, perhaps; but if your surmises are correct, quite justifiable under the circumstances. The broken lock is certainly an obstacle, but I think it can be overcome. If you can manage to walk as far as the wood-shed, I think I can explain better what my plans are."

The earnestness of the young man's manner, the tone of his voice, and the straight, truthful look of his eye, seemed irresistibly to have overpowered Mrs. Duncan, and rising, she said quickly, "Mr Leighton, if you will help me, I will go with you. I feel that I must, and can, take you as my guide in this business.

John Leighton, with a low, earnest "Thank you," gave her his arm to which she clung trustingly, and led her gently out into the little garden and to the work-shed. Having lit the gas, he seated her on a low bench; and having drawn his small model from its resting-place, he put it on the table before her. Placing his hand lovingly on it, he said, thoughtfully, "I think this little machine will help us."

"But how? in what way? what do you mean to do? I scarcely understand you," replied his companion.

I can drive, by treadle power, from 15 to 20 small drills at the same moment, and at any distance from each other.

Now, if I cut out the metal covering of the broken lock in the safe at Nant Gwern, I can remove the bolt with ease. It only remains for me to make and take down a working machine like this and the thing is done.

"But, Mr. Leighton," broke in Mrs. Duncan, "I am still at a loss. How do you mean to get at the safe?"

"Why, through the window, of course," was the quiet reply.

"No, Mr. Leighton, I cannot, and will not, encourage or allow this. For me to run the risk is a different matter; but for you to jeopardise your liberty, for perhaps years, is absurd. You have no reason for such an action, Mr. Leighton, and I say again the thing is absurd."

"No reason," Mrs. Duncan, answered John Leighton, almost sternly, folding his arms, and leaning with his back against the table. "I will show you that I have a reason. Until the last week or two I did not know whether you were wife, widow, or maid. Is there any sin in a man loving under such circumstances? It might be presumptuous, but not sinful. Now, for the sake of the unspoken love I had for you, before I knew your story, I claim to be allowed to help you. Your husband, if living and a man of honor, could not blame me for the determination I have come to, which is that I will never rest until I have proved to you that you are either wife or widow."

Mrs. Duncan accompanied Leighton to Nant Gwern and at night he stole into the house and set to work on the safe; he was very angry with Mrs. Duncan, who followed him and insisted on being let in.

"I could not sleep," sobbed Mrs. Duncan, "and I slipped out without waking Mabel or Mary Mosscrop, who are in the same room with me, and started for a walk. I kept wondering if you had got in all right, and how you were going on, and I could not rest until I saw the windows, and then when I got into the grounds of this awful place I fancied all sorts of things. I thought I saw figures moving amongst the trees, and heard footsteps behind me, and whisperings, and I dare not go back. Oh, it is a horrible place this, an unhallowed place, a haunted place. Do not leave me, please, do not, Mr. Leighton. Would to God it were daylight."

"Come, come, this will never do," said John Leighton, "your imagination has run away with you. Now that you are here, you must stay and help me. I am getting on first rate; but first of all, let me turn on my lantern, so that we can see, and then you must give me some brandy and water, for I've been working hard since nine o'clock, when the old Williamses went to bed. I've some brandy and sandwiches in my bag."

So saying, he put his arm round her, and half carried her to where he had been at work, and made her sit down on a dusty couch, whilst he brought out some cognac, of which he gave her a stiff drink, asking her afterwards to help him to some, and after the shock she had given him he felt in need of it. The stimulant, and above all, his easy business-like manner, had a beneficial effect; and she found herself watching him curiously as he worked resolutely at his patent treadle drill.

"I'd a bit of bother getting the machine in," he said, "but it is working beautifully now that it is set up, and I think I shall be through in about an hour, and then for Mr. Capesthorne's secret whether it is ours or not. The bricks were a bit of a nuisance at first, but once I got one out it was easy work."

Chatting as though quite at his ease, John Leighton tried to distract his companion's thoughts from their gloomy surroundings.

To Mrs. Duncan when she let her eyes stray, they were worse than gloomy, they were horrible.

The strange sounds which seemed to echo through the house, the black depths of shadow from which peered out indistinct and ghost-like the pale faces of the dead and gone Capesthornes in their tarnished frames, that all-pervading and death-like smell, and the creaking and rustling of the branches against the uncurtained windows, through which unseen eyes might be watching were enough to upset stronger nerves than hers.

"Hurrah!" exclaimed John Leighton, "I'm through at last, and a good blow from the hammer should drive the piece right out." Moving the drill he hit the piece of perforated plate a resounding blow, and to his delight it gave way and fell with a dull clang inside. After a moment's work he withdrew the bolt and taking the lamp from Mrs. Duncan, he wrenched the door open. From her position she could not see in; well, indeed, for her she could not. What John Leighton saw seemed to freeze his blood with horror. There on the floor of that mysterious safe was a human skeleton. As the horrible truth flashed upon him he dashed the door to; he could not let her see what he had seen. As he did so, a shrill scream from Mrs. Duncan made him turn hurriedly, his first thought being that she had seen all; but this was not the cause of her outcry. Standing over her, one hand on her throat, the other grasping a revolver, was a pale-faced man, with eyes ablaze, his jet black hair making his face more ghastly in the lamp light.

"So you have found him at last, have you," he shouted, shrilly, "and I've found you just in time; you shall join him."

His look was demoniacal. There could be no doubt of his murderous intention. John Leighton did not hesitate an instant, but flung the heavy hammer which he held in his hand full at the madman. It struck him a terrific blow on the side of the head, and he fell headlong over his intended victim.

At this moment there was a rush of heavy feet, and the next instant two burly gamekeepers appeared on the scene.

"You've killed him, governor," said one excitedly, as he turned over the prostrate man; "and, by gad, its Mr. Capesthorne!"

He was not dead, however, only badly stunned. Mrs. Duncan had fainted, and John Leighton, after a hurried explanation to the two keepers, in proof of the truth of which he showed them the ghastly contents of the safe, had the Williamses roused, and the unconscious lady placed in the old woman's care. It appeared that the keepers had seen Mortimer Capesthorne wandering about, and taking him for a burglar, had followed him. Of course there was a tremendous sensation when the story became known. The bones in the safe were proved to be those of Paul Duncan, but how he had been enticed into that fatal house was never known.

A verdict of "Wilful murder" was returned by the coroner's jury against Mortimer Capesthorne, but he died raving mad within a week of the discovery.

Two years after the events as above described, a fair-haired girl of about twenty years of age was leaning over a chair in the balcony of a pleasant house, in sunny Sorrento, in which a pale-faced but handsome lady was seated, gazing dreamily upon the blue waters of the Bay of Naples.

"Only think, mamma," said the girl, softly, "does it not seem strange all this? Just because I was what Mr. Mosscrop called a distinguished visitor, I was taken to that horrid Nant Gwern where the jackdaw found poor papa's solitaire, and so many things sprang from what seems an incident. You are going to be Mrs. Leighton, and I am going to have a new papa."

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Duncan, kissing her, "and I hope you will love him as I do." [THE END.]

AN EXPENSIVE ERROR.

It is not often that one pays so heavily for one act of forgetfulness as I have done. One slight mistake, one for which I was hardly responsible, cost me over £20,000 and a nice country house in Bedfordshire.

The facts of the case are as follows: I had an aunt, by name Julia Reeves, an old maid of sixty, and possessor of the money and house which I have just mentioned. She is dead, and so I will say all I think about her—"De mortuis nil nisi bonum" is a well-known saying, but still there is another and a better which I often think over—"The evil that men do lives after them." This latter applies to women also, and with Aunt Julia this was certainly the case.

I was Aunt Julia's favorite nephew; when I was only a boy she had a serious dispute with her only other nephew—my cousin, and much older than I—and she never spoke to him again till the day of her death, consequently I had "great expectations" of being my aunt's heir. My parents shared in this belief, and as a result I spent most of my holidays in Bedfordshire —and very dreary I found them. When I grew up my aunt constantly invited me to stay with her, and as her invitations were really commands, I invariably had to go when I was asked.

She certainly expected me to make myself useful to her, and gave me little thanks for my trouble; but then she more than once gave me clearly to understand that I was down as sole heir in her will, and I know I was, but a certain unfortunate accident happened which caused her to alter her mind—and her will.

Four years ago in August I was staying with her, as I always did four or five times in the year, for long and short periods, when the sad affair occurred. My aunt, be it known, was a little eccentric—in fact, I tried to upset her will on the ground of insanity, but failed—she also had an extreme fear of thunderstorms. Whenever a thunderstorm commenced she ran down to her wine-cellar and crouched in the very darkest corner there till all was over.

Her cellar was a regular strong room with an iron door and a patent lock, the key of which she nearly always kept in her own possession; she never allowed it to leave her own hands except when, as sometimes happened, she gave it to me when she wished me to bottle some wine for her, which frequently took place, as she always bought her wines in casks, and I being particularly good at the work, it was one of the various ways in which I made myself useful to her.

One day, during the last visit I ever paid Aunt Julia, I had been bottling some wine for her, when something or other called me away just as I had finished, and I left without locking the door. I was away about ten minutes, during which time a violent thunderstorm, which had been threatening, took it into its head to burst.

I stood at the window for a minute or two to look at the lightning, which was particularly vivid, and then, remembering the cellar was unlocked, I went downstairs, locked the door, and put the key in my pocket. I then ran up again hastily to lunch, which I took alone and earlier than usual, as I had to go to London on business which would detain me all night.

As Aunt Julia's house was some distance from the station, and as I had but little time to catch the train, I had to start before the thunderstorm was quite over, and was driven hurriedly away, having quite forgotten to give the key of the cellar to the butler in order that he might give it to his mistress. It was a fatal mistake.

In due course I reached London, and met the friend whom I had to see on business; we separated very late at night, so when I got home I went straight to my bedroom without lighting the lamp in my sitting-room, or looking to see if there were any letters awaiting me, I was awakened about nine o'clock in the morning by the servant with a telegram. He told me two had come for me the previous night as well, and handed me all three. They were all from my aunt's butler. The first was, "Come back at once with the cellar key"; the second, Start at once and bring the key with you"; the third, "Cannot understand delay, most serious, start immediately."

What a fuss to make about a wretched key, I thought, but I could not afford to disobey these peremptory summonses, and so I started off at once. At two o'clock I was alighting at Aunt Julia's door. I was somewhat disquieted, for the station-master had informed me that the dog-cart had been down to meet every train from London that day and the two last trains the previous night. Still, I had no suspicion of the truth, but thought that Aunt Julia was getting madder than ever.

The dog-cart had no sooner drawn up at the door than the butler ran out, looking as if he had not been to bed all night, which, indeed, I afterwards found out was the case.

"Thank goodness, you've come at last, sir," said he; "the mistress might go of her head if she was kept much longer."

"What rubbish is this about the key?" I asked. "It's safe enough with me, surely?"

"Too safe, sir," said the butler. "We've been trying to break into the cellar since three o'clock yesterday afternoon. You left Miss Reeves locked up in it!"

I saw it all. I had forgotten my aunt's habit of hiding herself in the cellar during a thunderstorm, and had locked her in. She must have slipped in during my short absence upstairs, and been shut in by me when I returned to lock the door. The village blacksmith, the butler told me, had been at work for three or four hours, but the solid iron door and the patent lock had been too much for him, and he had gone away exhausted, without having made any impression on them, while a maid was good enough to inform me that "Poor Miss Reeve's cries was simply heartrendin' all night."

I didn't lose much time in rushing downstairs and unlocking the door, when my aunt came out, pale, dirty, covered with straw, and with her hair hanging over her shoulders.

"My dear, aunt," I began.

"Monster! don't speak to me:" she said, "you did it on purpose; but you shall pay for your practical joke."

"Such an idea never——"

"Oh, didn't it? Were you not telegraphed for three times, yet you did not come till it suited you? Leave my house at once," and she hurried past me to her room. Attempts to see her were useless; and I left the house without succeeding in catching a glimpse of my dear Aunt Julia. I wrote letters to her but they were returned unopened, and I never saw her again.

A year ago she died, and I went down to hear her will read, with slight hopes, but still with hopes. They were not realized. She left all her property to a missionary, who had got around her—he has since gone out, he says, to convert the heathen, but has not unfortunately, gone to a cannibal island. My name was indeed mentioned, however, in a special clause—"To my nephew, George Reeves," it ran "he having once valued its possession so highly, I leave the cellar key."

Blenkinsop—Don't fret, my boy. Santa Claus won't forget you.

Tommy Blenkinsop—That's all right, dad; I ain't afraid he'll forget the tin whistle I asked for; but I can't help being a trifle nervous about his recollecting the bicycle and the watch and chain.

The Swedish Lutheran social last Wednesday evening was attended by nearly three hundred people and the large church was taxed to its utmost capacity. Rev. Moody had charge of the program for the evening which consisted chiefly of music, The Black River choir and the St. Hilaire choir and orchestra rendered several pieces each. Socially it was a complete success and also financially as over eighty dollars was cleared from the supper.

The case of the state against J. W. Howes who was charged with embezzling a quantity of flour and which was on trial yesterday, has been dismissed. It was proven conclusively that by the defence that at the time the suit was brought that an open mortgage had been given on the staff of life, and further more that Mr. Howes himself had an interest in the article.—Crookston Times.

The fact that Geo W Allen the originator of the Homestead law of 1868 died yesterday in an Ohio county infirmary a poor man is suggestive of an apparent unequal distribution of compensation in this world. Allen spent all his money getting his measure before the country. Thousands and thousands of men have acquired the rights and benefits of freeholders under this act. Vast regions of this country have been settled up under it. Enormous riches have been developed through it. The original bill of 1868 has been amended several times, and for the advantage of the bona fide settler. The memory of Allen should be perpetuated monumentally by his countrymen, Steps have been taken to raise a fund. It should be no small affair. In every state of the Union subscriptions should be opened.—Journal.

Board of County Commissioners see the Necessity of a New Bastile.

Crookston Tribune: The County Commissioners at their last meeting made a pretty fair proposition to the the city of Crookston asking for lots whereon to build a county jail. The commissioners came to the conclusion that it was necessary to take steps to build a jail in the near future, as they consider that this city would take a great interest in an enterprise of that kind, they think the city should donate three or four lots in a suitable location where the county would build a good substantial jail, that would accommodate the the ill-doers for the next fifty years. If the county is ready and willing to at once erect a building of that kind, the enterprising people of Crookston should lose no time to extend the courtesy asked for by the commissioners. Some rich real estate owner should at once hand over four lots before the commissioners get out of the notion to build a jail. Don't wait. Pick out the lots in a good location and then the county fathers can't do otherwise than to put up a building as agreed to. That is now a structure which the county is most in need of and Crookston should see to it that four lots will not stop its construction.

In commenting upon the market prices of farm products the government crop report says: "The price of corn is 2.9 cents per bushel more than the average of ten years, from 1880, and only four-tenths of a cent less than the average of the decade from 1870. The average value of the whole crop since 1883 has been higher only in 1887 and 1890 when the yield was only about 20 bushels per acre. The value of the wheat crop is 2.5 cents per bushel higher than the average of the ten years from 1880, and has been exceeded only once, in 1888, since 1883. In the states of the Atlantic coast and those on the Gulf of Mexico, except Texas, the value is from $1 to $1,16. In the Ohio valley from 85 to 86 cents, beyond the Mississippi, from 70 cents in North Dakota to 81 cents in Iowa. Only once since 1883 has the price of oats been as high as at present, 32.2 cents, which is 1.3 cents higher than the average of ten years from 1880. The prices of all cereals have been remarkably sustained in view of the abundance of production.

The legislature of 1890 made provisions for paying a bounty of one cent a pound on every pound of starch to be manufactured in North Dakota for the coming five years if the raw material is grown within the state's confines. The legislature of 1891 followed this with an appropriation of $3,000 to carry on the provisions of the act. The only factory established for the crop of 1891 is at Hankinson Richland county, and the proprietors have filed their first report of its operation with the commissioner of agriculture. They show that they have made 140,000 pounds of starch and are entitled to receive a bounty of $1.400. All of the product was shipped to Boston for boxing in the small packages of commerce, The ruling price of the potatoes used by them has been 18 cents a bushel and the factory made quite a market for the tubers of the southern part of the state. It is said that the proprietors are well satisfied with the experiment and another year will see them enlarging their factory and making preparations for a large output of starch.—Grand Forks Herald.

An Oddity in Painting.

The provincial cities of France are just now being entertained by a remarkable artist, one who displays wonderful skill in her own peculiar style of painting. With plates of various colored sand before her, she takes the sand in her right hand and causes it to fall in beautiful designs upon a table. A bunch of grapes is deftly pictured with violet sand, a leaf with green sand and relief and shadows with sand of the colors to suit. When this has been admired by those artistically inclined, it is brushed away and is soon replaced by a bouquet of roses or some other object, all done with great dexterity and delicacy. Even the finest lines are drawn with streams of sand, all as distinct as though drawn with an artist's brush.—St. Louis Republic.

Getting Oil from Smoke.

It appears that in Scotland there is a company which pays a certain amount yearly to a number of iron works for the privilege of collecting the smoke and gases from the blast furnaces. These are passed through several miles of wrought iron tubing, and as the gases cool there is deposited a considerable yield of oil; one plant is reported to yield 25,000 gallons of furnace oil per week. The sum paid for this privilege is such as to be profitable, it is said, to both parties. The oil thus obtained is distilled, and a considerable quantity of cresol, pheuol and some other substances are procured from it, while the oil remaining is used as an enricher of gas for illuminating purposes.—New York Sun.

THE CROCUS' SOLILOQUY.

I waked ere bluebirds 'gan to trill—
When peony bulbs in slumber lay,
And wild winds whistled loud and shrill
Across the sunset bay!

I rose, for then I longed to see
Again the friends I loved; but, oh,
My thorny neighbors hindered me;
That's why so frail I grow!

Red roses my proud neighbors are,
And one old hypocritical plum!
They rake my breast, and is it fair
That they so near should come?

But though they build their tangled bowers,
Not one of every prickly elf
Can catch a sunbeam for their flowers,
Ay, quicker than myself!

In early spring their stalks are bare,
And through them glance the sunbeams bright;
By rising earliest, my share
I get of life and light!

I love the world! my friends I love!
But, oh, I never wrong my neighbors!
On those who strive their worth to prove,
Fortune bestows her favors!
—Arthur E. Smith in Arkansaw Traveler.

A Jeweler's Story.

A jeweler relates this surprising story: "Some time ago Mr. A. came to my place and bought a pair of diamond eardrops for his daughter, a girl of seventeen or eighteen, who was attending school. Her teacher was struck with the gems and asked leave to borrow them and take them home. This permission was readily given. A few days later I went into a lapidary's shop that I was in the habit of visiting to get jobs done once in a while, and there I saw a pair of earrings beside the cutting wheel. 'Hello,' said I, 'where did these come from?'

"The lapidary said: 'Oh, that's a job that came in this morning from Funkenstein, down the street. He wants the diamonds taken out and paste put in their place.'

"'Well,' said I, 'you'd better save your labor. Don't do any work on those until you hear from me.' I went to Mr. A., brought him to see the earrings, then we went to Funkenstein's together and asked how he came by them—for they were the pair that I had sold a few days before. He said that they had been brought to him by Mrs. ——, a school teacher, who had concluded to sell the stones and replace them with imitations. We decided to spare the woman, and of course the diamonds were returned, but I never learned how Funkenstein squared accounts with her."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Latent Diphtheritic Germs.

I might mention many physicians' families that have been desolated by diphtheria contracted from them. The occasional latency of diphtheria, and the necessity of a more frequent inspection of the fauces of children who have been exposed to the disease, so as to be able to detect and isolate these walking cases, was forcibly shown by the following instance:

I was once called to a boy with diphtheria, and it occurred to me to examine his sister, who had left the call at my office. She was then in the street with some playmates, and was apparently as well and cheerful as they were. On inspecting her fauces a small but characteristic grayish white patch was observed over one tonsil.—Dr. J. Lewis Smith in Babyhood.

Funny Speeches.

Grose relates that Caulfield, meeting Mr. Thomas Sandby, said: "My dear Sandby, I'm glad to see you. Pray, is it you or your brother?" It was a Spaniard who remarked ingeniously that an author should always write his own index, let who will write the book. Edgeworth relates the story of an English shopkeeper who did pretty well in the direction of the bull proper, when, to recommend the durability of some fabric for a lady's dress, he said, "Madam, it will wear forever and make you a petticoat afterward." This is quite equal to the Irishman's rope which had only one end, because the other had been cut away.—Temple Bar.

A Sufficient Epitaph.

It were a pity that the good sayings and witticisms of Lowell should be lost. I send you one of which he was the author at a medical dinner given in London a few years ago. In his speech he alluded to a distinguished surgeon whose fame was so great that no marble monument was required to commemorate the name. The doctor's friends, said Mr. Lowell, thought it sufficient to lay him in the country churchyard with the simple and famous epitaph on his grave:

Si monumentum quaeris circumspice.
(If you seek a monument, look around).
—Cor. St. James' Gazette.

A Simple Cure for Consumption.

An American physician, Dr. Helmer, asserts that a dose of peroxide of hydrogen, twenty drops in water every day, will do more toward curing consumption than anything previously used for that purpose. He further states that sixty drops will sterilize a quart of milk and render it harmless to children. This is applying peroxide of hydrogen to nobler uses than bleaching hair, for which purpose it has been principally used.—New York Recorder.

An Apt Reply.

"What is that," said an oriental ruler at his banquet, "which did not come last year, has not come this year and will not come next year?" An officer, unabashed, replied, "It must surely be our back pay." Instead of being punished for his humor the man received what was due him and was promoted to a higher position.—San Francisco Argonaut.

The wealthiest insane asylum in America is said to be the Sheppard asylum i. Baltimore. It was endowed in 1857 with $560,000. Since that time the trustees using the interest alone, have expended $880,000 in buildings and land, and still have a capital of $600,000.

The largest tuning fork ever manufactured was made at Hanau for the Physiological institute at Leipzig, and weighs twenty-seven kilogrammes, or a little over seventy-two pounds, and gives fourteen double oscillations a second.

DIDN'T KNOW THE MAN.

Two Strangers Ran Up Against Moses Frost and Were Surprised.

Moses Frost stood 6 feet 4 in his socks, and was called "the best man on the river"—a phrase that expressed admiration for his physical, not his moral, qualities. He was, nevertheless, generous, truthful, brave and altogether a fine specimen of the wilder Canadian backwoodsman. The title implied that he had successfully "tackled" all the famous "bullies" of the Upper Ottawa, even the terrible Joe Maufraud, thirty years ago champion of "the French." Moses, in a squeaky, shrill, slow, small treble, that came absurdly from so big a man, used to tell me his experiences.

"Ther' is some use in havin the repytation of bein a purty good man," he squeaked modestly. "I reckon ther' haint been no peaceabler man on the river than me sinst they give up tryin to whale me, 'most three year back. Last time I fit was because two men that never seen me before didn't know me when they did see me."

"Tell me about it, Moses," said I.

"Well, surveyor, it was about New Year's, the time me'n Lilly Ann got hitched. My woman was dead sot on seein the fashions down to Portage du Fort. So we started two days after the shindig for to have a weddin trip. She said that was the right way. We stopped at Rattray's instead of Paddy Scully's place—the best ther' was goin wasn't too good for Lilly Ann them days.

"Well, Lilly Ann was mighty took up with the circus picters on Rattray's barn. I'd 'a' took her in, too, on'y it was gone more'n four months."

"But what about your last fight, Moses?"

"Yas—yas—I was disremembering! Well, it was when me'n Lilly Ann was goin back home. You mind the bridge before you come to the Calumet?"

"The high bridge over Brabyon's creek?"

"Yas, that's it. I guess it's maybe the length of your chain down to the creek in summer. That time the holler was drifted half full of snow. Well, there was the two of 'em on the bridge—one of 'em looked like a good man. Says he to me: 'We're wantin a ride!'

"'I can't give ye no ride,' says I. 'Ther hain't room, boys, for I've got the woman, don't you see?'

"With that the big one runs to the head of my pony. I didn't want to get out and hurt the man, but says Lilly Ann, 'Be you goin to stand that, Moses? If you be, I'll get out and whale 'em myself.' She'd 'a' done it, too, surveyor. Mebby you never heard what Lilly Ann done to Joe Maufraud that time he"——

"You'll tell me that story another time, Moses. What did the two men do?"

"Oh, yas. Well, I jumped out and the other one come up, squarin off. He fell easy. Then the big one runs in. Mebby you never see a bull moose comin at you lickety pelt?"

"The fellow ran at you head down, eh?"

"Jeseggsackly. Well, I stood to one side sudden, and give him a trip. Then I takes him by the trowsis and the back of his neck and pitches him over the railin.

"With that Lilly Ann says, 'You're purty good yet, Moses,' and she jumps out, laughing. There we stood and looked over the bridge right down."

"Was the man hurt?"

"Hurted! How could he be hurted, an him fell into seventy feet of snow drifted in the gully? He did have some considible trouble gettin footin to lift out his head. Then he looks up and says he, 'Who in thunder be you, anyhow?'

"'He's Moses Frost,' says Lilly Ann.

"'Murderation,' says he. 'If we'd knowed that we wouldn't have wanted no ride.'"—Youth's Companion.

Monkeys and Troches.

As I was lingering before the monkey cage in the Dresden Zoological garden, a slight tickling in the throat, a chronic trouble with me, induced me to take out of my pocket a box of bronchial troches and to put one of them in my mouth. Instantly a large monkey of manifestly aspiring nature thrust out his hairy arm and palm with a beseeching look that I would give him one. Why should he, too, not be allowed to enlarge his terrestrial experiences and share the joys of the superior being before him? So I gave him a troche, which he at once clapped in his cheek.

"Scarcely did the bitter taste strike him than he snatched it out with his fingers and began rubbing it violently on the hair of his arm, as if to rub off the bad taste. Seeing, however, that the superior being continued to suck his troche serenely, he soon put his own back in his chops to give it a fuller trial. It proved too much for him to stand very long and so out he pulled it a second time and began rubbing it on the sanded floor of the cage.

"Over and over the process was repeated; but each time as his reverential eye fell on the superior being outside still peacefully sucking his own, a reflective expression came over his face which as much as said, 'Surely if that manifest god out there enjoys this nasty thing there must be some desirable quality in it that I am not developed enough to appreciate.' So patiently the aspiring simian went on till he had dissolved the last particle of his troche."—Boston Herald.

A Foolish Question.

One of the peculiarities of human nature is to ask a question that is exceedingly foolish. For instance, if one sees a friend knocked down by a coal cart, the first question that he is apt to ask is, "Did you get knocked down?" At Troost park one evening a gentleman was standing on the edge of the lake when he slipped and fell in. Naturally his temper was at a white heat. He glared about savagely, when a stranger, who was standing by and who had seen the accident, asked, "Did you fall in?" The fellow paused, and while his eyes were snapping fire remarked sarcastically: "No, I didn't fall in. The lake walked up on me."—Kansas City Times.

A Big Yield.

C. H. Bullock, of Northfield, Minn., has obtained 1,120 bushels of potatoes from one acre of land. This is said to be by far the largest yield ever known, 800 bushels being usually considered a big crop. That the 1,120 bushels were all raised on one acre of ground is sworn to by a number of trustworthy people of the vicinity. Mr. Bullock will net $336 for his product, nearly all clear gain. Last year he would have made $800 off the same yield, as the price of potatoes was high then. The farmers in the vicinity are considering these figures and thinking of potatoes a good deal.—New York Sun.

A CHRISTMAS CURE.

A Story of the Season for Small Boys.

Santa Claus sat by the fire in his own home looking very much troubled.

Santa Claus sat there thinking—thinking. It was just before Christmas. What was the matter with the good jolly old Saint? Had his sleigh broken down? Had any of his reindeer got loose?

But no,—it was none of these things. Couldn't he find toys enough to go round? Bless your dear little anxious heart, don't you be afraid of that! Santa Claus had toys enough. That wasn't the trouble!

One stocking there was for which Santa Claus had not yet planned a single thing; and that was why poor dear old Santa Claus was in such a state of worry and anxiety. This stocking belonged to a little boy whose good parents had long before Christmas sent in his name to Santa Claus. But although there had been plenty of time, and Santa Claus had put plenty of thought upon the matter, he had not yet been able to decide upon one thing for that little boy's stocking.

Perhaps it seems strange to you that Santa should be puzzled about such a thing as that, when filling stockings is his regular profession, but the little boy to whom that stocking belonged was a very strange and unusual child. Whatever was given to him he would either break to pieces very soon or do some naughty mischief with.

Yet kind old Santa could not bear to leave even this stocking empty. So he had been puzzling his brains to find something with which the little boy could not hurt people, and something he could not break; and although he had been thinking over all his lists of toys and presents, nothing had he found yet!"

"Chirp! Chirp!" sounded a sharp little voice. "You may as well give it up. He doesn't deserve anything, the little scamp!"

"Oh! Is that you, Cricket?" said Santa. "Come up here," and as he held out his fat forefinger a tiny black cricket reached it with a sudden jump.

"You may as well give it up!" creaked the cricket. "You can't think of anything. I know."

"I know, I know;" said Santa. "No! I can't give him the donkey!—nor any other of those fine little animals that we have this year. I had thought of a nice little hammer and box of nails, and some blocks of wood for him to drive the nails into! Hey, now! what do you think of that?"

"What do I think?" said the cricket. "I think, Saint Nicholas, that you have forgotten how the little boy beat his brother with his drumsticks; how he snipped his sister's fingers with the scissors; how he threw his harmonica at the nurse; how he—"

"Dear, dear, dear!" groaned Santa, "so he did, so he did!"

"And if you keep giving him things when he uses them so wrongly," continued the cricket, "how will he ever learn better? To be sure, his mamma and papa and all his kind friends are trying to teach him, but it is necessary that everybody should help to train such a boy as—"

"I know," interrupted Santa, "I know. You're a wise little counselor, and not as hard-hearted as you seem. And if you think it will cure the poor little fellow, I suppose we must give him the sawdust this year."

"Yes," said the cricket solemnly, "sawdust it must be."

Christmas morning came. The little boy whose name Santa Claus did not wish mentioned, saw all the other children pull out one treasure after another from their long, well-stuffed stockings, while in his own, which he had hung up with so much hope the night before, there was nothing but sawdust!

If I should use all the sad words in the English language I could never tell you how sad that little boy was as he poured the sawdust out of his stocking, and found that Santa Claus had really sent him nothing else.

Poor little chap!

It was almost a year later, just before Christmas, when Santa Claus again sat by his fire—thinking.

But this time he was in no trouble; no, indeed, not he! He was rounder and rosier and jollier than ever before; and how he was smiling and chuckling to himself! His eyes twinkled so, and were so very bright, that you could almost lit a candle at them. He and the cricket have been planning all sorts of ecstatic surprises for the stocking of the boy to whom they had given sawdust the year before; for, if you can believe it, the little boy had been trying all the year to be careful and gentle, and he was really quite changed!

"Sawdust is a grand thing," chirped the cricket leaping about in delight.

"Yes, but I am glad we do not need to use it this year," replied Santa. "Let me see the list again. Don't you suppose we could cram in one or two more things? Have you put down the—"

This is the end of the story; or at least, all that could be told before Christmas; for if I should write more and a certain little boy should read it, he would know just what would be in his stocking and that would never do in the world.—St. Nicholas.

ACCEPTING PRESENTS.

The Mere Acceptance of a Gift Does Not Force You to Return It.

At the holiday season the giving of gifts is prevalent. Now everybody can give sweetly, graciously and lovingly. How many can accept in the same spirit? I felt last year that there was a thread of coarseness in the girl who, looking at a fine book that had been sent her by a friend, said: "Oh, dear, I suppose I shall have to get her something in return for it!" That's barter and exchange. It isn't giving. Nothing was to be sent in return for the book unless it were the sweetest of thanks, and the mere fact of the acceptance of a gift does not force upon you its return.

Gift giving is like love, the desire is supposed to come from the heart, and no gift is worth anything unless it is sent with that feeling, and that only. But then you think you are to accept, and never to return? My dearest girl, we never know how we return things in this world, but everything does equalize itself. You have been a charming companion, and have brightened many a moment to a woman whose purse is better filled than yours. She sends you, when a Christmas Day comes, some dainty present, some pretty trifle that she knows you will like, a book about which you have talked, or a picture that you have admired; the return you make should be your thanksgiving, and that is all. Your gift of a joyful presence was made long before the material one. I do not mean by this that the woman who is not rich must not give—God forbid it—but I do mean she must not think of attempting to return at once the gift that has come to her. It is vulgar, my dear.

Wait until another gift day comes round, and then give something that expresses yourself, the child of your brain and your fingers rather than your purse. After all, Emerson struck the key-note of gift-giving when he said, "Our gifts are for the most part expressionless. Let the sailor bring a sea shell, the poet a poem, the painter a picture," and these are the gifts that, being a part of yourself, may be received as of greater value than anything which money could obtain.—Ladies' Home Journal.

RELIC OF NAPOLEON.

A Stone on Which the Arbiter of Europe Cut His First Teeth.

A writer in the Critic tells a true story, illustrating that species of coincidence which is always happening in this prosaic world.

One day, as we were sitting on the piazza, the conversation turned by chance upon curios and relics.

"This is rather an interesting souvenir," said a young lady, displaying a charm attached to her watch chain. It was a dark bluestone, oval in shape about an inch and a half long, and covered with hieroglyphics. It was a handsome thing, and would have delighted an antiquarian as much for its beauty as its apparent age.

"What do you suppose it is?" inquired the owner.

We rubbed our foreheads and thought.

"Pharaoh's signet-ring," suggested one.

"A charm from Washington's fob," said another.

"You would never guess," replied the young lady, "and I will tell you. It is," and she dangled it before our inquiring eyes, "it is the stone on which Napoleon Bonaparte cut his first teeth."

Before most of us had time to recover from the shock of this announcement a practical-minded member of the party pointed to the hieroglyphics, and asked:

"Are those the prints of his teeth?"

On closer inspection, however, they appeared to be Arabic characters.

"Are you sure that the stone is really what you say?" asked a doubter.

"Perfectly," was the assured answer. "It was given to my mother by Joseph Bonaparte when he lived at Bordentown, and he told her that the baby Napoleon, when he was just beginning to take notice, clutched at the stone which his mother wore on a chain about her neck, and was so determined to have it, that she took it from her own neck and put it round his. After that, he used to bite on it until all his little teeth had come through."

Her Heart's Desire.

There comes a time once in every year, when children may without impropriety give their loving friends a hint in season.

Uncle William was talking with Lucy, his best little niece, about Chrismas. He wished to know her mind upon a certain highly interesting subject, but preferred to get at it indirectly.

"Now Lucy," said he, in a casual manner, "if I were going to buy a doll for a little girl, what kind of a one do you think she would like?"

"O Uncle William," answered Lucy, with undisguised interest, "there's nothing like twins!"

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria,
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria,
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria,
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

Naomi was 580 years old when she got married. Truly, the Bible is a great consoler.

HIGH APPRECIATION.

It pays to make honest, pure goods. Take the success of Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder that has maintained its standard for purity and excellence for the past forty years. It is the oldest and now the only Pure Cream Tartar Powder to be obtained. Dr. Price has spent almost his whole life perfecting it, and enjoys the distinction of being the only physician that has devoted his time entirely to perfecting the articles of human food that bear his name—a name and a reputation synonymous with pure food preparations throughout the land.

Here are the indorsements of the United Cooks and the Pastry Cooks' Association of the United States. What higher praise. Its officers, whose signatures are given, are all men who have given dignity and character to their profession. Members of these associations are the chefs and cooks of the leading hotels, restaurants, clubs and private families, and certainly no higher commendation could be found for an article of daily use in the practical culinary art, like that of baking powder. Here is what they say:

This is to Certify, That the Cooks of this Association, and its members, have used Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder and recommend its use in preference to all others.

For quick raising and fine cakes, pastry, etc., it has no equal. It is free from ammonia, lime or alum. The most perfect Baking Powder made.

THE MARKET TURNED.

How a Young Man, Who Waited for Prices to Drop, Got Fooled.

One day, while George Mace was walking through one of the side streets, just off Broadway, he saw a pair of vases in the window of a little shop. They were large and hideously Japanese in design, and therefore appealed strongly to his uncultivated taste.

The inspiration flashed across him that here were the very things to give Nellie for Christmas; they would look well on the mantel of her room, without destroying the effect of the other decorations, which were of a sort to stand a good deal of killing. The price was only five dollars, and they certainly made a great show for the money.

This was in September.

In October, George walked around and looked at the vases again. They were still there, but had been "Reduced to $4.93."

"Wonder why they knocked off the seven cents?" thought he; "probably for luck."

Along in November George took another look in the window. This time the vases were placarded: "Cheap! $3.87."

"Better yet," he mused. "I guess I won't buy now; they may take another drop." And he turned and walked away.

A few days before Christmas, George strolled around to the little shop, fully determined to make the purchase.

As he drew near a bright blue sign in the window caught his eye:

NEW IMPORTATIONS or
HOLIDAY GOODS.

At first George was afraid his vases might have been cast aside to make room for the new stock, but he soon saw them in the old corner.

Before entering the store he stopped to read the figures on the ticket, and received a shock which nearly dislocated his nervous system.

OUR CHRISTMAS TREE.

O,
the Christmas tree
so bright and green, awaits Old
Santa Claus.
And the chimney place all swept and clean gapes wide its ponderous jaws.
The little stockings are all hung up, and baby's just makes four. Won't old Santa Claus be surprised when he finds there is one more! There's an elegant place up in the tree to hang Johnny's gun and a place for May and one for Kate to leave their dolls upon. But for little baby blue eyes a lower branch he must choose. Where she may reach and find the place he's hung her first shoes
Turn down the light a little now, so good old Santa Claus can see. And baby and all must go to bed and be as good as can be,
and to-morrow morn get up early, after a long night's sleep, and come softly down to the Xmas tree
and see
Who will get the first peep.

Nothing Like It.

Mistaken Christmas Expectations

The clerk begins to bustle around pretty lively now, and does his work square up to the handle, in view of a possible Christmas present. And the employer pretends to notice and be pleased with the clerk's efforts, and this makes the clerk work harder than ever. In fact, he works so hard that he reduces his flesh, and by Christmas times he has to take a reef in the back of his vest, and his trousers are baggy, and his hat comes down over his eyes and ears. And he doesn't get any Christmas present out of his employer. The clerk should never try to get ahead of his employer on funny business, because the employer is the sharper of the two. If he were not, he would still be a clerk.

An Unnatural Mother.

"I believe I've got the meanest mo in Texas."

"What did she do?"

"Just before Christmas she put me into long trousers. She did that so I would have to wear short stockings that wouldn't cost so much to fill. What do you say to that for meaness? She'd make a nice stepmother, she would."

OUR CHRISTMAS TREE.

This

Christ-

one of the best type, too;
and while, dear sir, 'tis not a fir, yet it was made fir you. 'Tis true, you see upon this tree no presents rich and rare; yet
please be kind, and bear in mind, in wish the gifts are there. We now wish all, the short and tall, young, middle-aged and gray,
the poor, the rich,
white,

A MERRY CHRISTMAS DAY.

Elaborate Christmas Celebrations.

One of the most elaborate celebrations of Christmas that ever took place occurred in 1252, during the reign of Henry III. The marriage of the Kings' daughter, the Princess Margaret, with Alexander, King of the Scots, took place on that Christmas Day. The Archbishop of York gave 600 fat oxen and £2,700 toward the expenses.

In the year 1248 this same Henry III. filled Westminster Hall with poor people and feasted them royally at his expense throughout the whole of Christmas week. On Christmas Day he caused a great number of cattle to be slaughtered and, throwing open his palace gates, permitted the populace to enter, and allowed each man to carry off as much meat as he could impale and bear away upon his dagger.

MY CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

I gave her a ring,
My love to declare;
'Twas the daintiest thing,
Not unworthy my fair—
Gold with diamonds there,
Quaintly chased and embossed;
And I scarcely should care
To tell how much it cost.

In return—well, you see,
I have nothing so show,
Then she must have scorned me
And my loving gift? No!
What she gave me was—oh,
Far more precious than this!
Heart and soul overflow,
For she gave me—a kiss.

A Fair Strategist.

"I think it's just horrid in you men to claim a kiss just because you happen to catch us under a little piece of mistletoe," said Miss Thirdseason, as she clung to the arm of a modest gentleman and led him about so gently that he was unaware that he was being piloted. "You men take advantage of us just because an old heathen custom sanctions it. I tell you I am very careful to keep away from it. No man ever kissed me yet, and I'd die before I'd let him do it. Oh! Mercy! There's the horrid thing right over my head now," and she turned her face up and stood paralyzed with fright until the spell was broken in the regulation way.

Not a Local Disease

Because Catarrh affects your head, it is not therefore a local disease. If it did not exist in your blood, it could not manifest itself in your nose. The blood now in your brain is before you finish reading this article, back in your heart again and soon distributed to your liver, stomach, kidneys, and so on. Whatever impurities the blood does not carry away, cause what we call diseases. Therefore, when you have a snuff or other inhalant can at most give only temporary relief. The only way to effect a cure is to attack the disease in the blood, by taking a constitutional remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which eliminates all impurities and thus permanently cures Catarrh. The success of

Catarrh

As a remedy for Catarrh is vouched for by many people it has cured. N. B. Be sure to get Hood's.

"German Syrup"

Asthma.

"I have been a great sufferer from Asthma and severe Colds every Winter, and last Fall my friends as well as myself thought because of my feeble condition, and great distress from constant coughing, and inability to raise any of the accumulated matter from my lungs, that my time was close at hand. When nearly worn out for want of sleep and rest, a friend recommended me to try thy valuable medicine, Boschee's German Syrup. I am confident it saved my life. Almost the first dose gave me great relief and a gentle refreshing sleep, such as I had not had for weeks. My cough began immediately to loosen and pass away, and I found myself rapidly gaining in health and weight. I am pleased to inform thee—unsolicited—that I am in excellent health and do certainly attribute it to thy Boschee's German Syrup. C. B. STICKNEY, Picton, Ontario."

HARD WORK, NO PAY

Terrible Treatment Received by Laborers at the Hands of Railroad Contractors.

Nothing Received in Return for Weeks of the Hardest Kind of Work.

WATERTOWN, N. Y., Dec. 29.—Charles Renner, Stephen Broes and Otto Keys arrived at Carthage Saturday night and were glad to get shelter in the village lockup. They were not tramps, and the story they told was so similar to others that have been heard in this section lately there is little reason to doubt that there is some truth in it. Renner is an intelligent German, whose story is as follows:

Three months ago I left New York City to work on the railroad near Tupper's Lake. Our fares were paid to our destination with the understanding that it was to be taken out of the first month's pay. We were promised $1.25 a day and good board and lodging at 50 cents a day. Arriving there we found that the contractors owned the store and boarding house. The latter were cold and cheerless. There were no stoves. The only means of heating was by a fire place cut in the wall. It was simply a large half circle cut in the wall and stones were laid in the floor to prevent burning. There was no chimney. When the wind was in the right direction there was a draught which carried the smoke away, but when it blew toward that hole in the wall the smoke staid in the room, making it suffocating. The building was so loosely put together that we were often compelled to get up three or four times in the night and warm ourselves at the fire.

The beds were bunks, of which there were three tiers, one above the other. In each of them there was a quantity of loose hay and one blanket. Pay day was on Sunday always. On the first pay day I went with others to draw my pay, and when my name was called I stepped up. I was informed that I was in debt to the company for $2. There were no explanations given and we were compelled to submit. I had $12 or $15 with me when I went into the camp. Such big prices were charged at the company's store that I walked to Tupper's Lake, where there was a store, and purchased what I needed.

On the second pay day I thought I surely would receive some money, but on my name being called I found that I had been charged $10 for the use of the company's tinware and that every other man in the camp had been used the same way. There were seventy of us, which made $700 for the use of the tinware, and there was not a hundred dollars' worth in the whole camp.

We were all in debt to the company. The next month was no better. We were told that there was nothing coming to us.

I worked until last Monday and quit. Three men with me did the same. We asked for our time and were told that unless we returned to work we would get nothing. As we had not had anything so far and the prospects did not seem to improve, we thought that we should be just as well off to quit and start away as to work and be forever in debt to the company. The contractors out here are all southern men and so are all the boarders. There are a great many negroes and a large number of Italians. The latter have had much trouble. A number of them have been killed.

The men say that when they arrive at New York they will employ an attorney to obtain redress for them.

UGLY DEVELOPMENTS.

The Davis Family Troubles Liable to Be Settled Outside of Courts.

BUTTE, Mont., Special Telegram, Dec. 29.—Mrs. James L. Davis, who shot her husband in a main street grocery store last Saturday, wounding him twice in the thigh, was admitted to bail in the sum of $300 to-day, before a justice of the peace.

Her husband's wounds are not at all dangerous, and he will be well enough to be about again in a few days. She has laid a complaint against her husband and Mrs. St. John, charging them with adultery, under which they were arrested and have given bail to answer.

It is certain that if the friends of Mr. Davis can prevail upon the authorities not to press either charge they will both be dropped, as there are believed to be ugly developments in the background. It is known that an offer has been made to Mrs. Davis to withdraw prosecution for the shooting if she will agree not to press the adultery case, to agree to allow her to procure a divorce from her husband, and to make full provision for her child's maintenance. But the prosecuting attorney has refused so far to consent to dropping either of the criminal cases.

THREATENED BY CRIMINALS.

Plots to Take the Life of State's Attorney Elliott of Chicago.

CHICAGO, Dec. 29.—Hounded by the threats of criminals whose enmity he has incurred in the line of duty, Assistant State's Attorney William S. Elliott, Jr., lies at his home suffering from nervous prostration. Within the last two weeks a deep-laid plot to take his life was revealed by a prisoner in the county jail, and although every precaution has been taken it is feared that the danger is not yet past. The whole affair is enveloped in a veil of mystery, which it is almost impossible to penetrate.

Those cognizant of the facts admit that the affair is very serious. Mr. Elliott admits the truth of the report, but declines to give details. It is known that his life has frequently been threatened by criminals, and he was once assaulted and dangerously hurt by a prisoner whom he had convicted.

Suffered the Penalty.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Dec. 29.—Lem Jones, ex-county superintendent of schools, was hanged at Oliver Springs to-day. Jones met his death for the murder of his wife and child; braining his child and splitting the woman's head open on the night of June 26, 1890. Jones was county superintendent of schools and a man of prominence, and his crime was a nine days' wonder. For some days previous to the murder he had been in his cups and drinking unusually heavy. Going home one night about 1 o'clock he found his wife and child waiting for him. This exasperated him, when he began to abuse them. The wife cried for mercy. It seemed to exasperate him the more, and, seizing an ax, he murdered them both and fled. Two days later the child was found lying across its mother's breast.

Bank Officials to Be Tried.

ABERDEEN, S. D., Special Telegram, Dec. 29.—The cases of the state against Hagerly and Paul Hamus were entered upon this afternoon and the entire time consumed so far in an effort to get a jury. State's Attorney Cramer and Hon. A. B. Melville will prosecute and Attorneys Gordon, Crofoot and Huse defend the defendants charged with receiving bank deposits when they knew the bank was insolvent.

Polluted by the Professor.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 29.—Blairsville, Indiana county, is excited over the discovery that Prof. Ennis, for ten years superintendent of the public schools, has been demoralizing the boys and polluting their morals. Eight or ten of the largest pupils were before the board and made most startling revelations. Ennis came to this city and was arrested, but afterwards released and has gone West. Before leaving he made a written confession and prayed for leniency on the part of his prosecutors. Prof. Ennis is fifty-four year of age and has always been prominent in church and social circles.

ECCENTRIC AND WEALTHY.

Silas Cheney Suddenly Disappeared After the Death of His Stepdaughter.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., Dec. 29.—No word has as yet been received as to the whereabouts of Silas Cheney, the eccentric old brother-in-law of the late Horace Greeley. He disappeared from this place four weeks go and nothing has been heard from him since. He had been a boarder at John Rowland's, in West Asbury Park, whose stepdaughter, Miss Mamie Bishop, died under peculiar circumstances on Thanksgiving night, after being ill but a few hours.

Immediately after the coroner had taken charge of the body and had ordered an inquest, Mr. Cheney left town, saying he was going to visit his brother at Litchfield, Conn., who had fallen and broke his leg. Since his departure word has been received from Mr. Cheney's brother asking for information as to Silas' whereabouts. The letter stated that Mr. Cheney had never visited him as he announced he intended to do.

Mr. Cheney is quite wealthy and owns considerable property at Litchfield and at this place. He is also a stockholder in the New York Tribune. It is the general belief that the old man knows something concerning Miss Bishop's death, and left town so as not to get his name mixed up in the matter. The inquest as to the cause of the death of the girl will be continued to-morrow.

Confession of Faith.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 29.—Rev. Moore, secretary of the committee for the revision of faith of the Presbyterian church which meets in New York Jan. 12, has received the following reports from 200 presbyteries: Twenty-seven approve without asking for any change; 114 approve with amendments proposed; 15 ask that the work of revision be discontinued; 35 ask for a new formula of doctrine under various designations and for various uses. No report has been received from 41 presbyteries, and 3 disapprove entirely. Those not answering are, as a rule, foreign presbyteries, and will be entitled to vote when the general assembly convenes in Portland, Or., the latter part of next May.

After the Entire Sims Gang.

SHUBUTA, Mill, Dec. 29.—The latest and best confirmed reports from Choctaw is that John Sims, a brother of Bob, who has not heretofore participated in Bob's vagaries and lawlessness was arrested Saturday because of letters found in Bob's house and in the pocket of one of the Savage boys implicated him. It is believed he was lynched before his custodians reached the jail with him. Mrs. Sims promises to reform and live as other citizens do. She says she never approved Sims' course, but dared not oppose or leave him for fear of her life. It is believed McMillan, Utsey and Miss McKenzie will recover. The citizens are still organized and diligent in their search after other suspects.

Report of a Lynching.

GREELEY CENTER, Neb., Dec. 29.—Word was received here that Joe and Dick Kruth, who murdered Robert Kuntz near Spaulding and were being brought to this place by the sheriff, were lynched by a masked mob about eighteen miles north of here. The sheriff and his deputies were overpowered, the report says, and the men hanged to a tree. The sheriff should have arrived here to-night and as nothing has been heard from him it is thought the story is untrue.

Found With Her Skull Crushed.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 29.—When Frederick Dockenwodel opened the door of his broom factory this morning, he discovered the dead body of a young girl named Ellen Winter lying on the floor in a pool of blood, with the skull crushed. The police have arrested John D. Haney. Some years ago Haney betrayed the girl. The supposition is that Haney and the girl met last night, that they quarreled and that he struck her on the head with some blunt instrument, crushing her skull.

Other Arrests May Follow.

ELLENDALE, N. D. Special Telegram, Dec. 29.—Many ugly rumors are afloat in connection with the late Farmers' and Merchants' State Bank failure here. The president of the bank, H. O. Barratt, has been arrested on the charge of receiving deposits when he knew the bank was insolvent. He waived examination in justice court to-day and was held to the district court in $500. There is strong talk of making other arrests.

Hanged Himself.

WAUSAU, Wis., Special Telegram, Dec. 29.—Fred Baumgardt, a butcher of this city, committed suicide to-day by hanging himself in his shop. The cause of the deed is supposed to have been insanity. This is the third member of the family that has committed suicide. Baumgardt was forty years old, and leaves a wife and large family of children.

An Inhuman Father.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Dec. 29.—Charles Kimbell seriously and probably fatally whipped his three-year old child last night. The child was disrobed and put in a tub of ice cold water and allowed to remain some time, and the inhuman father then took it out and thrashed it with a heavy leather strap, cutting its body in a horrible manner.

Caused by Family Troubles.

NEW RICHMOND, Wis., Dec. 29.—Saturday Mrs. Will Hill, aged thirty-five, a respected lady and mother of one child, attempted suicide in a desperate manner at her home in Roberts, ten miles south of this city, by taking a half ounce of laudanum. Shot by an Officer.

MANKATO, Minn., Special Telegram, Dec. 29.—This morning Officer Walter Daniels saw a man dart out from the side of G. M. Phillips' barn, and, thinking something wrong, pursued. After calling on him to halt he pulled a revolver and fired, the bullet entered his back just above the right and passed through his body. The wounded man has been identified as Charles Hodge, who has been arrested several times within ten years. Public sentiment is on the side of the officer, who is one of the best on the force. The attending physician says that Hodge will probably die.

SMOOTH PORTER.

How Census Bob Is Making Himself Solid With the Democrats.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Dec. 28.—Porter has been quite busy of late unloading men in the census office, and nearly every Western Republican senator and representative is being besought to restore some man who has just been discharged.

Quite a sad story is told of a number of clerks who were furloughed for a month and went to their Western homes. On returning at the expiration of the time allotted to them, they were informed that there was no further work for them. But they find that the people of the District of Columbia and Maryland who were furloughed with them were restored to their places.

There is no apparent doubt now that Porter has fixed the Democrats so that he will not be seriously investigated. The Gorman-Tammany crowd which is running things in the house has been so well taken care of in the matter of appointments that it will make no effort to investigate the census office, and if others try it the rotten concern will be whitewashed.

The Greif's Hall Incident.

CHICAGO, Dec. 28.—Two thousand men and women gathered at the Second regiment armory to-day to publicly protest against the action of the police in raiding two peaceable meetings at Greif's hall on Nov. 12. While not unusually demonstrative, the great crowd vociferously applauded every strong appeal made by the several speakers, and at times insisted on the speaker repeating his scathing remarks. The meeting was called to order by James Mohran. Henry D. Lloyd, a former Chicago newspaper man, was introduced as the chairman, and was the principal speaker. Resolutions were adopted instructing the chair to appoint a committee for the purpose of laying the facts in the case before the state's attorney and the next grand jury, and ask the impeachment and punishment of the offending policemen.

A Clerical Reformer.

PATERSON, N. J., Dec. 28.—Rev. Dean McNulty, of St. Johns' Roman Catholic church this morning made the rounds of a number of liquor saloons in search of violations of the excise law. He entered the saloon of James McCormick, the ex-ball tosser, and there found a number of men drinking. Among those in the saloon were Ald. Rowson and E. Fanning, the former being president of the board of aldermen. The dean afterwards visited Franklin Boyle's saloon and found policeman Thomas Mullen, who tried to escape by running into an adjoining building. The clergyman followed the policeman, finally cornering him and making him promise to prefer a complaint against Boyle for selling liquor on Sunday.

May Prove Homicide.

WINONA, Minn., Special, Dec. 28.—From present indications Winona will have a case against Adam Kilian for homicide at the next term of the district court. A few days ago Kilian, while intoxicated, struck John Victor, a companion, on the side of the head with a key. The wound was not deemed dangerous at first, and Kilian was held on the simple charge of assault, but was put under $1,000 bonds. At the time set for the hearing Victor was unable to be present on account of his injury, and the case was adjourned for a week. Yesterday, the time set for the hearing, Victor was again unable to be present and was becoming more feeble. County Attorney Fitzpatrick had the complaint against Kilian changed from assault to assault with intent to kill.

Charity Extraordinary.

MINDEN CITY, Mich., Dec. 28.—Twelve of the most popular young ladies in Minden society engaged to contribute $1 each of money earned by themselves to a fund for buying Christmas presents for the poor. Tuesday they appeared at the drug store of Edward Cross and asked for the job of sawing and splitting five cords of wood that lay at his door. The druggist consented. The spectacle of twelve stylishly dressed women sawing and splitting wood collected a crowd in short order, but despite the crowd, the tired muscles and blistered hands of the girls, they continued for two days until the job was finished and the dollar each earned turned in for the poor.

A Mind Hopelessly Wrecked.

NEW YORK, Dec. 28.—The condition of William J. Scanlan, the actor, remained practically unchanged to-night. To-day the demented actor's manager, August Piton, caused Scanlan to be removed from his apartments at the Hotel Imperial to his own residence, 129 West Ninety-fifth street. He has cancelled all engagements for the season and disbanded the company, as he believes the actor's mind is hopelessly wrecked.

Starving Mexicans.

CITY OF MEXICO, Dec. 28.—The governor of the State of Durango telegraphs that in that state people are actually dying of starvation. Corn is being sold at cost to the poor, and money or orders for corn are being distributed by organized charity. The president has ordered the proper federal officials to aid the poor in Durango, and also in other states where there is any suffering because of the scarcity of provisions.

Well, Well!

SAULT STE. MARIE, Mich., Dec. 28.—Rev. Robert W. Wallace, the evangelist, who has been saving souls by the score in the Canadian Soo for some weeks past, created a sensation yesterday by marrying one of his converts, Miss Rachael E. Ross, a negress. The bride is well known.

Under Sealed Orders.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 28.—It was rumored that the cruiser San Francisco, which left here at 1 o'clock yesterday with sealed orders, would stop at Monterey, Cal., only a few hours for target practice. A dispatch from there says she has not been sighted, and it is now believed that she has gone direct to Acapulco.

Greeley's Brother-in-Law Missing.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., Dec. 28.—Silas E. Cheney, a large property owner in Asbury Park and Litchfield, Conn., and a heavy stockholder in the New York Tribune, has been missing for over a month, and his relatives are alarmed. The missing man was a brother-in-law of Horace Greeley.

A Coke Monopoly.

PITTSBURG, Pa., Dec. 28.—Negotiations are in progress for the purchase of the Hostetter Coke company's plant by the Frick Coke Co. The price to be paid is $1,600,000 in bonds on the latter concern. If the deal is closed it will give the Frick company almost a monopoly of the Connellsville coke trade.

Coming Tariff Bills.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28.—Chairman Springer, of the ways and means committee, will this week begin work upon the tariff bills which are to be reported by the ways and means committee. Probably the first bill presented will be one to place wool on the free list, but this has not been definitely settled. Representative Andrew of Mississippi has a number of tariff bills to introduce, and other members are well supplied with measures looking to tariff reform. Bills placing specific articles on the free list will follow each other in quick succession from the committee.

Miller, S. D, Dec. 28.—Melbourne's secret of producing rain will be tested here next season, Several adjacent counties have signified an eager willingness to join with Hand county in defraying the expense of the undertaking. Before the final contract is closed a trial rainstorm is to be produced for $500. Then, if there is still confidence in the new plan of rain to order, the deal will be closed for the season's moisture—the cost to be comparitively light for the half-dozen counties interested.—Dispatch.

Occasionally a Minnesota editor receives a sugar coated political pill. The latest to be thus provided for, is D. C. Lightbourn, the popular and able editor of the Norman County Index. He has just been appointed deputy insurance commissioner to succeed Deputy commissioner Dearth resigned to accept the agency for Minnesota and South Dakota for the Equitable Life Insurance company. These little tokens of appreciation are greatly appreciated by the newspaper boys.—Thirteen Towns.

New York Press: Free traders assert that Republican reciprocity which aims to develop markets abroad for American products without exposing American industries to destructive foreign competition, is "humbug" What are the facts? Here are some of them. The so called "transitory schedule" of the reciprocity agreement between the United States and Spain with respect to Cuba and Porto Rico went into effect on September 1 1891. The statement issued by the Bureau of Statistics for September shows how it has effected our exports to these islands. In September, 1890, our exports of merchandise to Cuba and Porto Rico were valued at $598,327. For September 1891 the first month under reciprocity, they were $897,695.

There is a question relative to the Chippewa Indians which should be discussed and settled by authoriety if possible. Under the Nelson bill by which they ceded their lands to the United states it is provided that when they accept the conditions of the treaty and take lands in severalty, that they became citizens of the United States and are entitled to all the rights privileges and immunities of other citizens, Does this mean, as the language of the act would imply, that they are so be entitled to the right of sufferage? If so the fact ought to be settled before another general election is held for it will make a great difference in the vote of several of the northern counties. As the government provides in the treaty that they shall not acquire full title to their lands for fifty years, that is in this respect at least they are to remain the wards of the government for that period, would it not be wise to also place some restriction upon the right of suffrage? Any elucidation which the wise can throw upon this question will be gladly given to the public through these columns.—Crookston Times.

New York City Dec, 28.—The Herald's Washington correspondent writes his paper that he has obtained valuable information not yet made public, to the effect that the government officials do not expect that Chili will meet the demands made upon her by this country and that the president has decided to ask congress to declare war against that country. for the past few weeks great interest in Chilian affairs has been noticed in both army and naval circles and although nothing positive has been given out, the Herald correspondent found out that preparations for active and immediate warfare were completed. The land forces numbering 10,000 troops are ready to sail at a moment's warning as transports have been obtained and the troops have been placed under command of General Miles who is most thoroughly competent to undertake the task. The naval arrangements are under the direction of Commodore Gorhardie. The Chilian minister at Washington is being greatly exercised over the active preparations now under way, and will ask the Chilian powers to sue for arbitration, The forces in the naval yards engaged in pushing the building of the men of war boats has been greatly increased and day and night gangs are now bending every endeavor to rush the boats through to completion.

Electricity and Ice Cream Poisoning.

A new experience of the danger of electricity has to be recorded. Dr. George S Hull recently conducted some experiments with ice cream freezers and he finds that galvanic action takes place, which results in the introduction of poisonous salts of copper and zinc into the cream. It appears that the freezer and the paddle are generally made of dissimilar metals, and the cream, especially if mixed with fruits or other acids or even saline substances forms an electrolyte, which naturally completes the necessary conditions for galvanic action.

With galvanic action there is, of course, chemical action, resulting in the formation of salts of zinc and copper, which become mixed with the cream. Dr Hull has probably discovered the cause of many mysterious cases of poisoning which have followed the consumption of ice cream. The remedy, however, seems very simple: if the freezer and the mixer were made of the same metal, no galvanic action could take place.—Iron.

The Longest Telegraphic Circuit.

Operator Dan Spencer, of the Buena Vista office of the Mexican Central railway, in this city, was called by the El Paso office, saying that the oldtime telegraph operators, who were having a reunion in Washington, would like to hear from their brethren and friends beyond the Rio Grande. El Paso signaled Spencer to call Kansas City, which he did, and Kansas City in turn told him to call Washington, who was evidently waiting, as the reply came instantly, when Spencer sent the following message:

"T. T. Eckert and the Old Timers: The railway operators and trainmen in the land of the Montezumas send warmest greetings."

The circuit was made by way of El Paso, Kansas City, Chicago, Buffalo and New York to Washington from this city, forming the longest overland circuit in the history of the telegraph.—Mexico Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Hysteria and Hypnotism.

At the recent meeting of the French Society of Hypnology in Paris Dr. Berillon astonished his hearers by stating that almost all children could be hypnotized except those who were idiotic or hysterical. The idea that there is any connection between hysteria and hypnotism was strongly disputed. One physician alleged that he had hypnotized sixty nine patients out of seventy-two under his care for various diseases in a hospital, and said it was absurd to believe that so large a proportion could be hysterical.—Exchange.

The Collection Bag.

In some churches years ago the collection was taken in small, close meshed nets with short handles. The latest thing made for this use, the collection bag, is a modification of the old fashioned net. It is a cone shaped plush bag seven inches in diameter and seven inches deep. It is secured to a hoop to which is attached a handle two or three feet long, as may be desired. The collection bag sells for four dollars. It has been in use about one year.—New York Sun.

A Metropolitan Merchant.

The boy was not more than 2½ feet high. But he was intelligent and energetic, and he hawked his newspapers with a zeal that would have been creditable to a high proof drummer. He was not unmindful of his dignity, and when one Broad street purchaser accompanied his tender of payment for a newspaper with a frivolous chaffing remark, the brisk little fellow embarrassed him with a sharp glance from two snapping black eyes, remarking the while: "Here is your change, sir. I have no time for fooling."

"Keep the change," said the purchaser, dropping the facetious and assuming a serious air; "will you tell me how long you have been selling papers?"

"I have been in the newspaper business three years," replied the diminutive merchant somewhat coldly.

"Three years!" exclaimed the man with unfeigned surprise, "why, my lad, you do not look big enough to carry a bundle of papers."

"Notwithstanding," said the mite, with unruffled dignity, "I have been in this business for three years, and for two years before I sold papers I was in the clothing business."

"Is it possible?" commented the questioner with increased surprise. "See here, my little man, how old are you?"

"Nine years old," calmly responded the little fellow. "I had to get out and hustle to help support the family when I was four years old. I belong to a family who waste no time."

The lad spoke the truth. He was born in East Broadway, and went to work in a clothing store when but four years old as cash boy. And there are many more like him in this large and progressive town.—Exchange.

Surprised the Young Preacher.

Robert Collyer, the preacher, said that when he was a young man preaching in Rockford, Ills., he was waited on by a delegation to ask him to speak at the county fair. They would pay him fifty dollars. He told them that he knew nothing of farming. "I couldn't raise a hill of beans and a turnip would stump me." But the committee said they had had speakers for years who knew all about such things, and they came to him especially because they thought he was not particularly well informed upon agriculture. He accordingly went, and had a royal good time.

"I should have called my speech, if the word had been coined at that time," proceeded Dr. Collyer, "sheer 'rot.' When I sat down I felt ashamed of it. The thought of meeting the committee again was dreadful to me. At last one of them approached me. He began by some commonplaces, which sounded to me very forced, upon the interesting nature of my address.

"'This,' thought I, 'is only the "taffy" with which he prefaces his announcement that they can't pay me fifty dollars for such drivel as that.'

"'Yes,' he went on, 'we liked it very much. But we hardly think it right to keep our original contract with you'—my heart sank into my boots—'instead we will pay you seventy-five dollars!'"—Cor. New York Times.

English Oysters.

The English system of oyster cultivation is still what it has been for hundreds of years in that country, and there are two parts to it. The dredging of the small oysters, or brood, on the open grounds near shore, and the subsequent planting of them on the fattening beds of Essex and the Thames estuary, and the culture of larger beds in deeper waters beyond the ordinary fore stages.

On the southern coasts of England the first system prevails, and the Thames oysters, which are the product of it, are by Englishmen esteemed the best in the world. They are, at any rate, rare and costly. The shell is delicate and the flesh plump. The Thames beds are for fattening and for breeding, and receive great care. Fattening oysters do not really yield much spat; and if any falls it is left to its natural fate in these beds. The nourishment the oyster gets there is "largely from diortomacim and minute spores of conferræ, the latter giving that prevailing delicate green tint" which the English connoisseurs delight in. Bushels of perriwinkles are scattered over the beds to keep back a too excessive growth.—Joel Benton in Drake's Magazine.

Was It a Coincidence?

It isn't worth while to worry over the cause and significance of strange happenings, especially when they are of the following character: A Detroit lawyer promised his wife a sum of money ($100) on a certain day, and when that day arrived he found, just before the close of banking hours, that he must pay in that money to save a note from being protested.

Accordingly he went home with a story elaborated as to the whys and wherefores, to receive a letter which had been delivered at his house and which contained a check for $100. The odd thing about this fact is that the check came from a client who had sent the lawyer scores of letters before and never before did he address one to the residence. The wife got the money without hearing of the other $100.—Detroit Free Press.

Muddy Liverpool.

Liverpool is rather a muddy place. The other day after a spell of wet weather a man walking along the pavement espied a hat floating on the surface of the roadway. He carelessly switched it aside with his stick when, to his astonishment, a head appeared beneath. "Well, you've chosen a nice place to stand in," remarked the owner of the stick to the owner of the head. "I'm not standing," replied the latter, in an injured tone; "I'm sitting on top of an omnibus." Yes, Liverpool is distinctly a muddy place.—London Globe.

A curious white frog has been on exhibition in London. It is a full grown specimen of a pure white color, its ruby eyes fringed with a golden hue, strangely contrasting with its pink iris and milky cuticle.

A Cargo of Serpents.

For two years agents of Mr. William Cross, the naturalist of Earle street, Liverpool, have been engaged in India in the collection of serpents, the result being that a cargo of reptiles has just arrived in Liverpool. After traversing the jungle districts, the collectors succeeded in capturing or purchasing from the natives who joined in the hunt about 300 pythons, some of them fourteen feet in length being secured. About fifty died on the journey through the country or failed to survive the passage home, when for the purpose of transit they were placed in long coffinlike cases, through which, of course, holes were bored for ventilation and feeding.

The surviving reptiles to the number of about 250 were unpacked at Mr. Cross premises, Earle street, but so excited were they on escaping from their long confinement that they gave considerable trouble. Some of the assistants, in endeavoring to recapture them as they wound themselves with remarkable alacrity around posts, stair bannisters, and the legs and bodies of those who happened to be in the way, sustained bites, which, happily, have not proved serious. Some of the larger ones also took to swallowing the smaller fry.

To place some of the large fellows in the cases reserved for them required the united strength of three men, and Mr. Cross himself had several times to be delivered from the coils of the creatures. The serpents have now commenced to lay eggs, of which there is already a small collection. So large a number of snakes has not been seen before in this country; but the demand for them from zoological societies, snake charmers and others appears to be larger than would be readily imagined.—St. James' Gazette.

A Stern Host.

There was a society wedding recently duly assisted at by the satisfied and admiring relatives of the very youthful bride and groom which had denouement too amusing to be carefully kept from gossip's keen ears. It seems that on accomplishing the first stage of the wedding journey a halt was made at a mountain hotel, the only one in the small summer resort which it adorned. The pair descended from their carriage, but instead of a smiling landlord, eager and hospitable, the host was serious and stern eyed.

"I'm a father myself," he commented to the astonished groom, when, after leaving his bride in the reception room he had followed the landlord to the office to secure apartments, "and no runaway couples can be accommodated here. I advise you, my boy, to take that young girl home at once without an instant's loss of time."

Indignant, the young husband protested, showing his card and giving his home and credentials. But the landlord was not to be duped by such manufactured proof, and the newly made benedict had to submit to the humiliation of permitting a dispatch to be sent to his father asking for indorsement. Of course the reply was prompt and equal to the emergency, but, pending its arrival, the unhappy couple were kept under surveillance in the public parlors.—Her Point of View in New York Times.

The Hole Shuts Up.

The Danish government, which is active in perfecting its small but powerful fleet, has given a practical demonstration of the value of cellulose as a defense against the entrance of water, following the piercing of a ship of war by a projectile. The vessel upon which the experiment was tried was the Hecla, the latest addition to the fleet. While at anchor another cruiser, the Absalon, took position about forty-five yards from the Hecla, which is protected with an inside lining of cellulose three feet thick. The Absalon discharged a projectile from a 5-inch gun, which pierced the Hecla at a point near the bow and at the water line. The latter immediately got under way and cruised about for three hours, the water in the meantime flowing freely above the holes caused by the shot. The cellulose, which dilated upon contact with the water, gave results apparently efficient, inasmuch as the compartment which had been pierced, at the conclusion of the three hours' cruise, contained but a trifling quantity of water.—New Orleans Picayune.

A Mile in Forty Seconds by Rail.

A mile in 39 4-5 seconds, or at the rate of over 90 miles an hour, is the fastest run ever made by a railroad train. This unparalleled feat has been accomplished on the Bound Brook railroad, between Neshaminy Falls and Langhorne, by engine No. 206, drawing two ordinary coaches and President McLeod's private car Reading, which is equal to two coaches in weight. Other miles were reeled off with speed as astonishing as this crack mile, and at the end of the "fly" the world's record was broken. From this out all records must date from the memorable Bound Brook flight. The fastest mile was scored in 39 4-5 seconds. The fastest five miles in 3m. 26 4-5s. The fastest ten miles in 7m. 12s., averaging 43 seconds per mile.—Philadelphia Record.

Menthol for Mosquito Bites.

Those who have tried ammonia and pennyroyal as a remedy against mosquito blood poisoning should try menthol, pencils of which cost from ten to twenty-five cents. If the bite is wetted with the tongue immediately after puncture, and well rubbed with the menthol until the peppermint action is felt, the inflammation will entirely disappear and no irritation ensue after the first minute or two. It is a real panacea and very little known.—New York Truth.

We are quite used to circuses that advertise investments from $1,000,000 to $3,000,000, but there is another side to the picture. In the small railroad towns of New Jersey a circus now making one day stands uses only two cars for its outfit and exhibits only one horse and one rider in the ring.

CULTURE OF CLOVES.

Something About the Planting, Growth and Harvesting of Cloves.

Sultan Seyed Said bin Sultan in 1830 introduced the clove tree into Zanzibar, since which time its cultivation has formed the chief occupation of the Arab planters in that part of the world, especially those residing on the Island of Pemba.

Every portion of the tree is aromatic, but it is the bud which forms the clove of commerce. The choicest are of a dark brown hue, free from moisture and with full, perfect heads. The cultivation of this important article of domestic economy is very interesting.

The seeds are planted in long trenches and kept well supplied with water for forty days, when the sprouts appear above the surface. These are carefully watered for two years at the end of which time they usually attain a height of three feet. Then transplanting takes place, the shoots being set out at distances of thirty feet apart and watered until well rooted. After this occurs the trees require little attention, but are kept free from weeds and the earth about them is worked over from time to time.

They do not bear until five or six years old, when the buds are fully formed into clusters and assume a dull reddish hue. The harvesting now begins and continues at intervals for six months, as the buds do not all mature at the same time. As the limbs of the trees are very brittle they do not bear the weight of a man, and the cloves on the upper branches are gathered by means of very peculiar looking four-sided ladders. Immediately upon being taken from the trees the buds are laid out in the sun, where in a short time they assume a brownish color, when they are placed in store-houses and are ready for shipment. The usual yield of a 10-year-old plantation is twenty pounds per tree.—Detroit Free Press.

BIRDS OF ILL OMEN.

Superstitions Concerning Some of the Feathered Fraternity.

In many parts of Saxony the peasants will not raise chickens, even though they could double their investment many fold. They call the male of the barnyard fowl the "bird of ill omen," from a notion that "he crowed for joy" at the time of the Crucifixion.

The majority of sailors on the Atlantic Ocean religiously believe that the frigate bird can start at daybreak with the trade winds from the coast of Africa and roost the same night upon the American coast. Ornithologists say that under favorable conditions the frigate bird will make two hundred miles an hour.

In Sweeden the turtle dove is looked upon as sacred. The Swedes call it "God's bird" and Noah's bird," from a notion that it is the same species of bird that the commander of the ark sent out to bring back tidings of a receding flood.

In France the quail is called the "bird of prophecy;" this from an idea that the number of his calls foretells the price of wheat. If he calls twice without resting the farmers expect but 2f. per bushel for their grain; if the bird calls four times, he expects to realize twice the price which two calls insure.

In olden times a bird called a "phenix" was thought to live in the deserts of Arabia. His lease of life was said to be 500 years, at the end of which time he built a nest of spices and fanned it into a flame with his wings. The flame reduced the bird to ashes, out of which he sprang to live another 500 years. Richardson says that he had 50 orifices in his beak, through which he sang melodious airs.—St. Louis Republican.

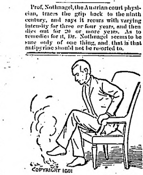
At Last.

Perseverance and devoted affection sometimes have their reward, in spite of croakers.

Tom—Why, Charley, how beaming you look to-day! What has happened to cheer you up so?

Charley—I've been courting a girl for a long time, but she would never admit that she loved me. She would only say that she respected me; but last night she confessed that she respected me no longer—that she loved me.—Exchange.

Prof. Nothnagel, the Austrian court physician, traces the grip back to the ninth century, and says it recurs with varying intensity for three or four years, and then dies out for 20 or more years. As to remedies for it, Dr. Nothnagel seems to be sure only of one thing, and that is that antipyrine should not be resorted to.



Stamped out —blood-poisons of every name and nature, by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

It's a medicine that starts from the beginning. It rouses every organ into healthy action, purifies and enriches the blood, and through it cleanses and renews the whole system. All Blood, Skin, and Scalp Diseases, from a common blotch or eruption to the worst Scrofula, are cured by it. For Tetter, Salt-rheum, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands, Tumors, and Swellings, it's an unequaled remedy.

Don't think it's like the sarsaparillas. They claim to be good for the blood in March, April, and May. "Golden Medical Discovery" works equally well at all seasons. And it not only claims to do good—it guarantees it. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, you have your money back.

You pay only for the good you get.

BREAKING SAD NEWS.

"Where is my mamma?" question oh, so strange,
To ask of mortal on this mundane sphere.
I can but hold my brother to my breast,
So like a lone bird fallen from the nest,
And kissing him, my thoughts I so arrange
To answer: "Darling, mamma is not here."

"Where is her, den?" the little mourner asked;
"Is she asleep?" "Yes, yes, my dear one, yes!"
I can but whisper, keeping back my tears;
"She is asleep, and never more in years
Will mamma come in all her tenderness."
My heart is breaking o'er my useless task.

Try as I may he cannot understand,
And I, as ignorant in my crushing woe,
Am but repeating all his lips have said,
I can but tell him that our mother's dead.
But what that means I feel I cannot know
Until we meet her in the heavenly land.

HOW THE JUDGE ARRANGED.

The Judge of the County Court was in trouble.

He had adjourned his court, the jurors had gone home, and he was left alone with the Sheriff.

No—not entirely alone—a sallow-faced woman in a limp and faded gingham sunbonnet and a limper and more faded homespun dress crouched down by the door of the Court House with a baby in her lap.

The Judge stepped outside for a moment and looked down the one straggling street which constituted the main thoroughfare of Blue Rock.

A dreary, drizzling rain was falling, and there was scarcely a sign of life in the little village.

"Jim!"

In response to the call the sheriff followed the Judge—he was a big, tall fellow, with a good natured face, and his shambling walk impressed one with an idea of his laziness and general incapacity.

"Jim," said the Judge, "I'll be durned if I know what to do with Sally Black."

The sheriff hitched up his baggy jeans trousers and then scratched his head.

"We're in a fix, Jedge," was his reply, and a broad grin spread over his face.

Undoubtedly the Judge was in a fix—he knew that well enough without hearing from the sheriff. Sally Black had been convicted of vagrancy in his court, and he had sentenced her to six months' imprisonment—a sentence which was to be carried out by knocking down the prisoner to the highest bidder.

As a rule, the prisoners disposed of in this manner were negroes, and the farmers of the country were always ready to bid for them and put them to work on their plantations, where they were treated like the other hands until their term of service expired.

The farmers around Blue Rock were a simple-minded, old-fashioned set of people, and the county court in their eyes was not a mill of criminal justice it was merely an agency through which they were supplied with laborers. They wanted Sally Black put through, as they expressed it, because she was the only regular tramp and beggar in the country—a good-for-nothing white woman, who had come from no one knew where, and was evidently going to the devil.

But when their wish was gratified—when the forlorn woman in her rags and desolation had been tried, convicted and sentenced, the honest countrymen slipped out of the court room with downcast faces and started homeward. Sheriff Jim spent an hour on a stump in front of the temple of justice vainly endeavoring to auction off his human merchandise, but nobody would offer a bid.

Of course it was no feeling of compassion for Sally Black that they held them back—it was the baby!

"Billy Betts would take her," said the Judge, coming out of a brown study. "I think, Jim, I'll send you down to the house."

"All right, Jedge," answered Jim. His Honor looked inside the door. Sally Black still sat on the floor leaning against the wall with her baby in her lap. She did not look up at the Judge's stern face, but the little girl did, and began to laugh and crow in a spasm of delight.

The Judge hastily beat a retreat.

"Jim," he said, "you needn't go after Betts.

"All right, Jedge."

"The fact is, Betts is not the right sort to have a convict; he's a hard man—too rough, you know."

"Jesso, Jedge."

"We'll lock her up in jail until to-morrow," said the other.

The Judge walked inside the court house and stooped down to tell the woman of his determination.

A pair of blue eyes flashed at him in riotous merriment, and a pair of pink fists struck at him and then the child's long fingers entwined themselves in his long beard.

"Oo's oo?" chirruped the baby.

His Honor pushed his captor back, very gently, and then looked at the Sheriff.

"She's a peart gal," remarked Jim.

The Judge bolted out of the door, followed by the faithful officer.

"Jim, this is getting serious."

"Looks like a tough old case," volunteered the Sheriff.

"I can't lock that baby up in our dirty old jail, and I won't."

"How will you fix it, Jedge?" asked the other. "Under the law we can't bid for the prisoner.

"I know what I'll do," said the Judge—"I say, Bob, come here!" he shouted to a man on the other side of the street.

Bob crossed over very reluctantly. He was a tenant on a small farm belonging to the judge, and he was behind with his rent.

He expected to be dunned, but he was mistaken.

In a word the situation was explained to him.

"But I can't bid," he objected, "I ain't able."

"D—n it, man!" shouted the Judge, "offer a dollar."

"But I can't pay that—I owe you fifty dollars now."

"Confound you!" roared the Judge. "Do as I tell you, and you shall have your own time about paying the back rent."

"All right," replied the fellow slowly, "but Sally Black cannot work, and I cannot afford to feed her."

"See here, Bob," growled the Judge, with a determined look, "you just put this woman and her baby in the little cabin on the hill. They won't starve. I'll send them enough to eat."

Bob had no more to say. It was a good bargain for him, and in less than five minutes he was marching down the street, followed by Sally Black and the baby.

The next day the Judge sent in his resignation to the Governor.

To his friends he made a very satisfactory explanation.

"Under our special act," he said, "I receive no salary. I am paid in fees, and I don't get any. Then I have to lend the prisoners money to pay their fines, and it is getting so that I will have to support some of the convicts. This court business will run me in debt if I stick to it, and that is why I resigned."

So Sally Black and the baby were quartered in a comfortable log cabin on the Judge's plantation, and their rations were sent to them every week from the big white house over the river.

What became of them after Sally's term was out?

The Blue Rock people would laugh at such a queston. They knew the Judge. Sally Black needs no written lease—no contract with witnesses. She will stay in the little cabin as long as she and the baby like it, and the neighbors think she is settled there for life.—Atlanta Constitution.

A Bit of Criminal History.

Sim Coy's new book brings out the historical fact that the first counterfeit greenback (1862 series) was made at Lawrence, in this county, during that year, by members of the criminally famous Johnson family. Many thousands of the bills were placed in circulation, people not dreaming of a counterfeit, so early after the first appearence of the bill, and besides the stirring events of the war largely diverted their attention from business matters.

Pete McCartney was the financial backer of the Johnsons, and after the plate had been worked the Johnsons attempted to unload McCartney, but his suspicions being aroused he stole the plate and caused it to be electrotyped, after which it was returned to its old hiding place. The electrotype was a marked improvement on the original counterfeit, and McCartney worked off his series in this city, and over $100,000 of the spurious stuff were readily placed in circulation. Meanwhile the secret service officers, led by Maj. Wood, had been apprised of the counterfeit, and were laying for the Johnsons and McCartney. Instead of tracking the latter to his rooms, where the printing was going on, McCartney was arrested at the postoffice, and in a few days, in company with the Johnsons, who had been found at Lawrence, he was forwarded under strong escort to the military prison at Washington.

While the train was crossing the mountains, although McCartney was handcuffed and shackled at the time, he managed to make his escape, and in two weeks he was back again in this city, secured possession of his electrotype and disappeared. It cost the government a great many thousands of dollars before the officers again laid hands on him. Meanwhile the Johnsons succeeded in making terms, by which they escaped prosecution by turning up the original plate and giving the officers certain pointers with reference to other offenders. Neither the Johnsons nor the government knew until long afterwards that McCartney had an electrotype, and had stolen a march on his former associates.—Indianapolis News.

Swagger in the Old Days.

From Besant's "Fifty Years Ago."

There is still swagger, even in these days; cavalry officers in garrison towns are still supposed to swagger. Eton boys swagger in their own little village: undergraduates swagger. The putting on of "side" by the way, is a peculiarly modern form of swagger; it is the assumption of certain qualities and powers which are considered as deserving of respect. Swagger, fifty years ago, was a coarser kind of thing. Officers swaggered; men of rank swaggered, gentlemen in military frogs—there are no longer any military frogs—swaggered in taverns, clubs, and in the streets. The adoption of quiet manners; the wearing of rank with unobtrusive dignity; the possession of wealth without ostentation; of wit without the desire to be always showing it—these are points in which we are decidedly in advance of our fathers. There was a great deal of cuff and collar, stock and breastpin about the young fellows of the day. They were oppressive in their gallantry; in public places they asserted themselves; they were loud in their talk.

Two Great Curiosities.

A traveler once with great seriousness related to a large company that he had traveled through all the world, and had seen at least one curiosity which had never yet been mentioned by any author.

This wonder, according to his assertion, was a cabbage-plant so large that under one single leaf fifty armed horsemen in battle array could station themselves and perform their evolutions. No one who heard this exaggeration deemed it worthy of refutation; but one said, with the utmost composure and coolness, that he, too, had been somewhat of a traveler, and had been as far as Japan, where, to his astonishment, he had seen more than three hundred coppersmiths at work upon an immense cauldron, and that five hundred men were to be employed to smooth and polish it. "For what purpose, then, would they wish to use this monstrous cauldron?" asked the first traveler, sneeringly. "For cooking the cabbage-plants, sir, such as you were telling us about just now," was the answer.

A TERRIBLE NIGHT.

My Darling Alice—I will try and be with you to-night. My business takes me to a small town about twenty miles from your house, and I could not bear to be so near without looking into your sweet eyes and hearing you say that you are true to me, so I shall ride over in the afternoon and, God willing, shall hold you in my arms to-night.

Your Own Jack.

Having despatched my day's business and sent this letter to my sweetheart, I, the Jack therein mentioned, hastened to hire a horse for the purpose of riding the twenty miles which separated me from Alice, my betrothed wife. As my business—which was that of travelling agent for a prosperous house—obliged me to be often away from home a chance like this to see Alice was very precious to me.

It was 6 o'clock in the evening when I started out on my horse from the door of the inn where I had been stopping. In vain was it that the landlord tried to dissuade me; his account of the lonely and desolate road and of the frightful things which had happened on it, of the murders and midnight horrors which hung over it, could not turn me from my purpose. Even the thought that I must pass by the haunted rock, in the dark alone and with no hope of aid, should I require it, that I must ride through passes which the village legends peopled with spirits and ghosts of the departed travellers, could not deter me. I spurred onward, and the dark forebodings of those assembled to witness my rash departure, my landlord's phrophecy of a sudden and violent storm ringing in my ears as I went. I treated the superstitious tales as merely the invention of ignorant villagers and the sounds which were reported to issue from the haunted rock, as at best, coming from the throat of some human enemy, against whom a pistol would be most effective.

There were still two hours of daylight before me, and as I rode along I was lost in thoughts of my sweetheart. I seemed to see her standing on her vine-covered porch, ready to welcome me with her bright smile. The dainty figure, with its blue eyes and waving hair, rose before my eyes, and so vivid was the vision that I spoke her name half aloud. The sound of my own voice startled me, and, looking up for the first time, I saw that the sky was growing black, the wind was howling and rumbling, distant thunder was in the air.

It had come—the storm which my landlord had foretold. I spurred on my horse; a big drop of rain splashed over my face; the darkness thickened, and at the same instant through the gloom loomed up the outlines of the huge bowlder, which a turn in the road had before hidden from my sight. A slight shiver crept over me as I recalled the tales connected with it and thought upon my own lonely situation. Something of this feeling seemed to enter into my horse, for as we neared the rock, shouded in darkness, he trembled from head to foot.

Using all my strength I forced him past it, and, at the same instant there sounded upon my ear a low burst of laughter so peculiar in its tone as to send an icy shudder through me. A something that was not human sounded in it. It was fiendish—devilish. Conquering my momentary weakness, I strained my eyes to pierce the darkness, in the hope of discovering the shape from which those sounds proceeded, but all was silent and deserted as the grave. The form must have been swallowed up in the darkness, for I saw nothing. A strange feeling of dread weighed on my heart, vague and indefinite, and the night grew blacker and blacker.

The storm grew nearer, and my effort was directed to gain some place of shelter from the rain. I looked in vain for a light in the distance; all was black and desolate; torrents of rain poured down, soaking me to the skin; thunder crashed, and my poor horse galloped as if for life.

Once, between the thunder peals, I seemed to hear that same low, mad laugh in my ear, and, shuddering, I wildly spurred my poor horse. Just then a vivid flash of lightning illuminated the road, disclosing a hut about 100 feet in advance; a second flash enabled me to reach the opening which had once been a door, but the whole miserable place was in a ruined condition. For years it had been abandoned to wind and weather.

Fearfully I entered and found myself in the largest of the two rooms which the hovel boasted. The ceiling was broke away, and the rain poured in upon the rotting floor and beat the broken window.

Nothing more fearful and more wild could be imagined, but still I welcomed it, and, turning the poor horse loose outside, I passed into the inner room. A lightning flash illumined it, and standing bolt upright against the opposite wall, I saw the form of a man, his face distorted by a smile of wicked cunning, and, as the darkness fell again a shrieking laugh mingled with the thunder.

Made desperate by the terrors of the night and of my loneliness, I struck a match and rushed forward; but the figure was gone, the room deserted. Turning, I passed into the first room, but it was equally tenantless. Full of wonder and strange forebodings I chose a dry spot and threw myself upon the floor and tried to sleep. Vain endeavor; the figure haunted me, and often, as fatigue overpowered me, and sleep seemed on the point of relieving me, the memory of that laughter would ring through my brain, and I would start wildly up to find myself alone upon the floor with the storm still raging without.

Finally, quite exhausted, I fell into a deep slumber, which lasted I know not how long, but which was suddenly and violently broken by that same demoniac noise.

This time I tried to rise, in vain; a fearful weight was on my chest. Straining open my eyes I beheld the light of the moon, which now shone through the window, that same man's face bending over mine. Terrified beyond expression, I struggled to free myself of the creature upon me; but my arms and legs were fast bound; the same cunning smile distorted the face, and the leering eyes rolled as I struggled vainly. I strove to shriek, but the sound came not; a faint gurgle was the only result of my frantic effort.

At the same instant the creature above me rose, and with chuckles and leers drew forth a coil of rope. Nodding his head and gibbering, he arranged a noose; and with another blood-curdling laugh he placed it about my neck.

My God, the agony of that moment, when I realized that I was absolutely at the mercy of that madman! Tighter and tighter he drew the rope, until my face grew black from suffocation and my eyes and tongue started from my head.

Consciousness was almost gone, when the pressure was slowly, steadily relaxed, and the maniac's features glared down upon me once more. I breathed again; he had spared me; the rush of joyful feeling overcame me. He marked the expression of my face, and, chuckling, drew the noose again, exulting to watch my face purple and my eyes protrude. Twenty times, with a maniac's cunning, he restored my breath and prolonged my torture. How he chuckled and muttered to himself, wagging his fiendish head, and oh! my God, how, when I struggled to get free, wrestling in agony with death and torture, he uttered his insane, exulting laugh!

How I longed and prayed for death; how I hoped the madman would once draw the noose so tight, that, when relaxed, my breath would still refuse to come. Suddenly his brain seemed possessed with some new plan. Slowly he drew off the rope, and with one backward glance he left the room. At first I dared not hope for life, but when the time went by and still he came not, I began to think that he was gone entirely, and that my life might be saved. I struggled to free myself once more; struggled and writhed until my heart nearly burst through my body, but in vain. Just then a new sound caught my ear, filling me with unutterable dread.

A fork of light shot up. Yes, it was true, the maniac had set fire to the hovel. And now I saw his face grinning at me through the window. Making one last superhuman effort, I uttered a fearful shriek. The madman leaped in at the window and at the same instant another form followed him. Some one seized me, I knew no more.

When consciousness returned, I was lying upon a bed in my sweetheart's own pretty room, and she with gentle tears in her eyes, watching me slowly return to life.

I learned afterwards, when my strength returned, that the madman had escaped from an asylum in the neighborhood and being missed, his keeper, attracted by the sight of the flames, arrived just in time to save me from the horrible fate which seemed to await me. I had fallen into a deep swoon, and from that into a raging fever, and during my ravings enough was learned to send me to the house which had been my destination when I started out the previous night. As soon as I was well again, Alice and I were married, and were surely happier than it falls to the lot of most mortals to be; but never while I live shall I forget the agonies of that one night of my life—Columbus Sunday Morning News.

Superstitions About Insects.

From the New York Graphic.

The koran says all flies shall perish save one, the bee fly.

It is regarded as a death warning in Germany to hear a cricket's cry.

The Tapuya Indians in South America say the devil assumes the form of a fly.

Rain is, in some parts of our own country, expected to follow unusually loud chirping of crickets.

Flies are sometimes regarded as furnishing prognostications of the weather, and even of other events.

Spaniards, in the sixteenth century, believed that spiders indicated gold, where they were found in abundance.

Although a sacred insect among the Egyptians, the beetle receives but little notice in folk lore. It is unlucky in England to kill one.

In Germany it is said to indicate good luck to have a spider spring his web downward toward you, but bad luck when he rises toward you.

The grasshopper is a sufficiently unwelcome visitant of himself in this country, but in Germany his presence is further said to announce strange guests.

A Welsh tradition says bees came from Paradise, leaving the garden when man fell, but with God's blessing, so that wax is necessary in the celebration of the mass.

The ancients generally maintained that there was a close connection between bees and the soul. Porphyry speaks of "those souls which the ancients called bees."

It is said that upon the backs of the seven-year locust there sometimes appear marks like a letter of the alphabet. When this looks like a W it is thought that war is imminent.

German tribes regarded stag beetles as diabolic, and all beetles are detested in Ireland, more especially a bronze variety known as "gooldie." It is also believed that to see a beetle will bring on a rainstorm the next day.

There are said to be no spiders in Ireland, nor will spiders spin their web in an Irish oak nor on a cedar roof. A spider is said to have saved Mohammed from his pursuers by spinning its web across a cave where he sought refuge. The same is said of David in the Cave of Adullam.

Expense at Yale.

The average expense at Yale per year has been for each freshman $788.90; sophomore, $831.84; junior, $884.17, and senior, $919.70. The largest expense reported for any one man was $2,900 for the year, although it is believed that there were some who got away with a little more than that amount.

Little Man.

The Boston Transcript prints an anecdote of a gentleman who was given to making friends with children wherever he met them, and one day tried to scrape acquaintance with a little fellow-passenger in a street-car.

The child wore a crimson plush coat and had long yellow curls, so the gentleman began with much confidence.

"How do you do, little girl?"

"I'm not a little girl," was the shy response.

"Oh! Aren't you? Well, then, how do you do little Boy?"

"I'm not a little boy," was the unexpected answer.

"Indeed! What are you then?"

"I'm my papa's little man," said the youngster, with perfect dignity.

An Extended Popularity.

Brown's Bronchial Troches have for many years been the most popular article in use for relieving Coughs and Throat troubles.

If the eyes are the windows of the soul, it is fair to assume that the lids are the shutters.

Even the illiterate man finds pleasure in a book if it's a plump pocket book.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria,
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria,
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria,
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

Christmas is over. Now the next thing is to get over Christmas.

Among the Pranks of the Foolish.

There is none more absurd than promiscuous dosing. For instance, inconceivable damage is done to the bowels and liver by mineral cathartics and violent vegetable purgatives. What these cannot do, namely, thoroughly regulate the organs named, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters can and do. Besides this it will prevent and eradicate malaria, rheumatism, kidney complaint and la grippe. Use it with steadiness.

Christmas comes but once a year, to make our pocketbooks feel queer.

Don't!—if a dealer offers you a bottle of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup without wrapper or labels, or in a mutilated condition, don't touch it—don't buy it at any price, there is something wrong—it may be a dangerous or worthless counterfeit. Insist upon getting a perfect, unbroken, genuine package.

No man ever made a success of trying to hide a Christmas present from his wife.

La Grippe.

How to Avoid Its Attacks and How to Recover from Its Effects.

As la grippe is undoubtedly caused by some micro-organism carried in and by the air, the best general advice which can be given is to avoid exposure to inclement weather, and keep your strength up, your blood in good condition, and your digestive organs in regular action. These last three conditions can best be attained by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which so happily meets the requirements that with its protection you Need Not Fear La Grippe.

It has been wittily said that la grippe "keeps you sick fifteen days after you are well," so slowly is strength recovered. Hood's Sarsaparilla has been found of inestimable value in restoring desired vigor after la grippe and also after scarlet fever, diphtheria, pneumonia, and other prostrating diseases. A young woman was in St. Peter recently asking alms, stating that she had been robbed of $30 in money and a railroad ticket to Butte, Mont. She excited considerable sympathy and received quite a little money. It now turns out that the woman was a fraud and that she had with her a male companion and that both lived in Mankato, she being one of the demi monde.

The Murray County Alliance held its annual convention at Slayton. The old officers were re-elected. B. F. Warren was elected delegate to the state convention. Donnelly was billed for a speech before the convention, but telegraphed his inability to be present because of sickness.

A Mankato special says: Officer Walter Daniels saw a man dart out from the side of G. M. Philips' barn, and thinking something wrong, pursued. After calling on him to halt he pulled a revolver and fired, the bullet entered his back and passed through his body. The wounded man has been identified as Charles Hodge, who has been arrested several times within ten years. Public sentiment is on the side of the officer, who is one of the best on the force. The attending physician says that Hodge will probably die.

Many ugly rumors are afloat in connection with the late Farmers' and Merchants' State Bank failure at Ellendale. The president of the bank, H. O. Barratt, has been arrested on the charge of receiving deposits when he knew the bank was insolvent. He waived examination in justice court and was held to the district court in $500. They leave nine young children, some of whom are also sick from the effects of the gas, but are expected to recover.

He says it is reported that some three or four hundred head of stray cattle are scattered through the country north of Dawson with all sorts of brands. It is thought that the principal portion of this stock is owned in the vicinity of Towner on the Mouse river, as they came from the northward.

A PRETTY GIRL'S PLAN.

To Be Rid of the Too Numerous and Too Ardent Swain.

One Lewiston girl believes that prayer meetings are not the place for flirtations and pairing off. She has known what it is to expect one or two men waiting at the church door every Sunday night with the question whether or no he may go home with her. She has determined to rid herself of both, and probably has. She went to the cake walk in Lyceum Hall recently and during the evening both asked permission to escort her home. She said yes to both. They both waited for her on the landing, and when she came downstairs she smiled and took one of each young man's arms.

At first they hesitated a little, but then went down the last flight of stairs at a jerky gait. At the foot of the stairs they both let go her arm and walked up Lisbon street, looking ugly at each other. She entertained them both with lively stories of the evening's entertainment. Each thought that the other would drop off at the head of the street and he would go home with the pretty girl; but no, they both went on up Main street, wishing in their inmost hearts that they were out of it. What a fool the other fellow was! Why didn't he leave?

In the mean time they went past corner after corner where each thought surely the other would say good night, for had not the girl said he might go home with her. So on they went until the gate was reached, and with a pretty thought about the effect of the moon on dried leaves in the gutter she asked them in. They both said it was late and looked nervous. "Can't you both come up and see me Thursday evening?" she asked, "Mamma would be pleased to meet you."

One said he had an engagement at the store that night, and the other said he was going out of town Thursday. After a moment, during which each thought it was time for the other to move on, the young lady said good night and went up the steps. No one annoyed her Sunday night when she came out of prayer meeting.—Lewiston, Me., Journal.

Electricity in Arms-Making.

The electric current has been utilized since 1880 at the small-arms factory at Saint-Etienne for annealing the steel wire of which the hammer springs of the rifle, 1886 pattern, are made. These springs are manufactured of steel wire, 7 millimetres thick, cut in lengths of 3.20 metres; the wire is rolled spirally, and a current of 23 amperes is passed through it. Heating is rapidly effected; when it is judged sufficient the circuit is closed, and the hammer spring is dropped into a water tank. One man can anneal twenty springs in three minutes, equivalent to about 2,400 per day. Electric annealing being clean in operation and cheap will no doubt soon be applied in numerous cases analogous to the one indicated.—Boston Transcript.

GARZA IN A BOX.

The Mexican Revolutionist Said to Be Surrounded by American Troops and Rangers.

Garza's Forces on Texas Soil Scattered by the United States Scouting Parties.

San Antonio, Tex., Jan. 5.—It is stated that the Mexican revolutionist, Garza, is surrounded in the chaparral in the extreme northwestern corner of Zapata county, by United States troops and rangers, and that it is almost impossible for him to escape, either to the northward or in the direction of Mexico.

Telegraphic communication between the military headquarters here and the posts on the border has been re-established. Advices were received to-day that the scouting of the last few days indicates the scattering of Garza's forces on Texas soil, and that they are either in hiding or have taken refuge in Mexico. Either result is possible considering the vast stretch of broken and bushy country on both sides of the Rio Grande and the sparse means of communication. Minister Romero's assertion at Washington that a prominent Mexican citizen was being held by Garza at Caja Del Prieto proves to be unfounded.

Capt. Johnson of Fort Brown telegraphs Capt. J. P. Martin, adjutant of this post, that he has just returned from a scout of forty-five miles up the Rio Grande, and searched several ranches, but found no revolutionists. Thirty Mexican troops acted in concert with him, proceeding on the Mexican side. Troop D, Third cavalry, under Capt. George Chase, left Fort Ringgold to-day with a detachment for Garza's supposed headquarters at Palleto Blanco, in Duval county.

Capt. Hunter, with another detachment of the Third cavalry, proceeded from Fort McIntosh to Los Angeles, in the hope of coming up with the enemy. Gen. Stanley has called upon United States Marshal Fricke for additional deputies to assist in preserving order on the border.

Capt. Chase and Capt. Hunter with detachments of the Third cavalry respectively, left Fort Ringgold, and Fort McIntosh today on fresh scouts. All the forces are suffering much hardship for lack of forage and water for their horses.

AID FOR GARZA.

The Revolutionist Receiving Money From Mexico and the United States.

City of Mexico, Jan. 5.—The Garza revolution is becoming a more important matter than the government is willing to concede. It is an open secret here that Garza is receiving money from both persons in Mexico and the United States, and that contrabandists of all classes on the border line of both countries are contributing to carry on the work.

Speculators in Mexican bonds are also said to be lending a hand. There is no doubt but that the government will finally triumph over the insurgents but it is possible that the present movement may be complicated with an uprising by hungry people in some of the suffering states, in which event, and in the hands of a competent leader, the revolt would have much greater force and perhaps tax the power of the government.

The latest news from the State of Durango is very sad. Though the government is trying to conceal the facts and is giving out contrary accounts, it is well known that the stories heretofore received were not exaggerated, and that many people there are suffering from starvation, and it is said if the government continues deaf to the cry of the sufferers a rising of the people may be expected. To use the words of a man of influence among the common people, "I prefer to die fighting rather than from hunger."

NEARING AN END.

Favorable Reports Received in Washington From Gen. Stanley.

Washington, Jan. 5.—Another telegram from Brig. Gen. Stanley, dated San Antonio, Tex., Jan. 4, received by Gen. Schofield to-night, leads him to believe that the trouble on the Mexican border with the Garza revolutionists is nearing an end. This telegram was as follows:

Commanding officer, Fort Ringgold, to-day reports courier in from Lieut. Beach at Pinepo, passed Capt. Hardie at Salenno. All information from that direction and from scouting parties in this vicinity indicate the breaking up and scattering of the band of revolutionists that had begun to form into larger forces. Reliable information received convinces me that the report mentioned in your telegram of Dec 29 was incorrect. All stage lines and travel here continue as usual unmolested to the present time. Capt. Johnson, at Fort Brown, telegraphs that he returned last night with a troop from forty-five miles up the Rio Grande, where a large ranch was searched. No force of bandits was found there. The situation of troops on the Rio Grande is as follows: Cavalry, scouting in Encinal, Duval, Zapata and Starr counties. River well protected from Ringgold to McIntosh.

The telegram from Gen. Scofield of Dec. 29, above referred to, called the attention of Brig. Gen. Stanley to reports current in Mexico that several large ranch owners in Texas were harboring and aiding bands of revolutionists.

SOMEWHAT PREMATURE.

The Boyd-Thayer Case Not Decided as Per Announcement.

Washington, Jan. 5.—The Boyd-Thayer case, involving the question of the citizenship of Boyd, and as a consequence his eligibility to the office of governor of Nebraska, to which he was elected, was not decided by the United States supreme court to-day.

An inquiry into the matter developed that only eight justices sat in the hearing of the case, Justice Bradley being absent on account of illness. A premature announcement that the court had decided the case in favor of Boyd by a vote of 6 to 3 cannot be correct, therefore, so far as respects the majority by which a decision is alleged to have been reached. The justices, of course, will say nothing whatever as to the case in advance of the announcement from the bench of their decision.

Bounced the Grand Duke.

St. Petersburg, Jan. 5.—It is reported that Grand Duke Sergius disguised as a peasant in order to discover the truth about alleged difficulties in the purchase of bread had a squabble with a baker and was thrown into the street by policemen who severely hustled him, and were about to arrest him, when he revealed his identity, whereupon three police officials committed suicide. The czar has given offense by declaring publicly that no famine exists and that there has merely been a partial failure of the crops. This expression of opinion is very general in official circles.

FOOLED THE BOYS.

A Scrub Pony From Idaho Performs Quite a Feat.

Memphis, Tenn., Special Telegram, Jan. 5.—Dr. Miller of Idaho perpetrated a little joke on a number of local horsemen here to-day, by which he won from them $10,000 in cash. He also took 160 acres of land from Pay Kendall of Chicago, who chanced to drift into the crowd.

Dr. Miller came here from the West a few days ago and brought with him a few horses. Among the lot was a little bay Indian pony, worth possibly $15. The doctor is an unassuming man, not given to bragging on his animals. A number of local horsemen were about the stable today talking of the good qualities of their beasts, when the doctor from Idaho remarked that his little Indian pony could perform a wonderful feat—he could draw a bag of sand weighing 300 pounds by a rope a half mile long. The idea was ridiculed, and the doctor offered to be bet large sums that the pony could do what he said. The wager was taken in large and small sums. One sport was so sure he placed $2,500. Pay Kendall of Chicago, who had won 160 acres of land on a jumping wager, put that up.

The time was set for 3 o'clock and a wagon load of rope hauled out one of the graveled pikes. The interest increased and so did the crowd until the roadsides were thronged. The half-mile rope was stretched, the load of sand fastened to one end and the pony to the other. The doctor patted his little scrub and gently led it up until the rope was taunt, when he gave it a sharp thrust in the ribs and the pony marched on one hundred feet, dragging the load of sand and winning for his master a neat sum of money and a quarter-section of land.

A FATAL BLAZE

A Restaurant Fire Causes the Loss of Two Lives.

Chicago, Jan. 5.—Early this morning fire broke out in the all-night restaurant under the Waverly hotel, 262 Clark street. The hotel was at once filled with smoke and the occupants rushed into the hallways and attempted to reach the lower floor. As a result of the fire, two persons were killed, one fatally hurt, and four others quite badly injured. The killed are: John Merideth, sixty-five years old, a temperance lecturer, St. Louis, and Paul Wood, seventeen years old. Those injured are:

Mrs. S. F. Wood, leg broken and injured internally; will die. Samuel F. Wood, bruised and partly suffocated; will recover. Mrs. Edward Cudwelser, overcome by fright and smoke; J. R. Clay, overcome by heat; Mrs. J. E. Smith, overcome by smoke; N. Frank, slightly injured by falling.

Ordered to Wisconsin.

Chicago, Jan. 5.—Capt. John B. Kerr, of the Fifth cavalry, stationed in Montana, has been ordered to report to Gov. Peck of Wisconsin for duty in connection with matters affecting the national guard. It is desired that the militia and regular army be kept in harmony in relation to certain army tactics, and Capt. Kerr will work to that end with the Wisconsin militia.

Local Improvements.

Mankato, Minn., Special, Jan. 5.—A daily paper, published in this city, has taken the pains to collect statistics showing the increase of improvements during 1891, and it figures up to about $800,000, which is a good showing for the year. This year it is expected that the new government building will be built on one of the busiest corners in Mankato.

Superior's New Industry.

Milwaukee, Jan. 5.—The Daisy Roller Mills company of this city has signed contracts with the Superior Consolidated Land company of Superior, Wis., wherein the former agrees to erect a flouring mill at Superior, the capacity of which, when completed, will be between 4,000 and 5,000 barrels per day.

Appointed Father White.

Hudson, Wis., Special Telegram, Jan. 5.—Rev. Father White, the prominent and well known Catholic divine, has been appointed pastor of St. Mary's church at La Crosse by Bishop Schwebach. This is the parish formerly held by the bishop himself. Father White will probably accept.

Will Adjourn Court.

Deadwood, S. D., Special Telegram, Jan. 5.—United States Marshal Fry, marshal for South Dakota, arrived in this city to-day and to-morrow will adjourn the regular January term of the United States court until Feb. 9, on account of the illness of Judge Edgerton. The calendar is quite large.

A Prominent Merchant Fails.

Eau Claire, Wis., Special Telegram, Jan. 5.—H. J. A. Schaefer, a clothing and shoe dealer, made an assignment to-day to Charles B. Swift. Mr. Schaefer was formerly register of deeds of Eau Claire county. His assets are about $6,500, liabilities not known.

Newspaper Sale.

Grantsburg, Wis., Special, Jan. 5.—The Burnett County Sentinel has just been purchased of the widow of the deceased editor by A. M. Anderson of this place. Mr. Anderson is a hustler and will attempt to make a better paper of it.

Started for Japan.

Deadwood, S. D., Special Telegram, Jan. 5.—Bishop Hare, Episcopal bishop of the South Dakota diocese, and that of Japan, left here to-day direct for Japan to be gone six months in connection with his church work in that country.

It's Now Judge Olson.

Grantsburg, Wis., Special, Jan. 5.—Gov. Peck has filled the vacancy in the office of county judge caused by the death of G. A. Olson by appointing Canute Olson, of the firm of Olsen & Hogents, merchants of this place.

A Vacant Office.

Grantsburg, Wis., Special, Jan. 5.—S. Grettum, who was the district attorney until last April, when he removed to Tower, Minn., has just sent his resignation to the governor. W. R. Maxwell will probably be appointed to fill the vacancy.

Died of Diphtheria.

Redwood Falls, Minn., Jan. 5.—Mrs. Morrison, a woman living here, was found dead. Her husband had deserted her, and she died of malignant diphtheria. She had not been sick long enough to attract the attention of neighbors.

Many People Ill.

Lake City, Minn., Special, Jan. 5.—A great many people in this city are afflicted with something very like la grippe, but as yet there are no serious cases.

Crisp Still Ill.

Washington, Jan. 5.—It is definitely settled that Speaker Crisp will not call the house to order to-morrow when it reconvenes after the customary Christmas recess. The speaker continues to improve in health, but his recovery is very slow, and he has not yet progressed far enough to make it safe for him to leave his room. Nothing has been said about a speaker pro tem, and Mr. Crisp has not indicated his preference. There seems to be a general belief on the part of Democratic members that Mr. McMillin of Tennessee should be elected speaker pro tem.

The farmers alliance man who predicted that wheat would be worth two dollars a bushel before spring, and advised all farmers to hold for that price, fails to show up. Advice is cheap but it takes lots of money to corner the wheat crop.

Several sleighloads of the young folks of Black River came up last Saturday evening joining with the young folks of the village in a dance in Dainard's hall. An oyster supper was served at the Commercial hotel and all seemed to enjoy the evening.

How are you fixed for insurance? Cold weather is coming on and you should protect your property against fire. Call at this office for rates. Remember that we can give you just as low a rate as anyone and give you your choice of several first class companies.

Wheat has not been coming in very rapidly the past week, There is still a large amount in the country but the farmers are evidently holding for better prices, These may come but the prospects for an immediate advance are not so promising as they might be.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Protests many and loud are being made against the proposed forest reserve in the Northern part of Minnesota by which it is proposed to fence in an area as large as the whole state of Vermont. The protests cannot be too many nor too vehement, The proposition is about the most atrocious and presumptuous that the forest preservations disciples—we will not call them cranks—ever have made.—Lumberman,

The startling growth of the debt of Canada which has increased from $78,709,742 in 1871 to $238,000,000 in 1891, with a population almost at a standstill and a stagnant trade, is stirring that country to its depths. Free comment is made about these matters and attention is drawn to the fact that while the United States government has reduced its debt from $59 to $16.50 per head in twenty years Canada has run up hers from $21 to $47 and the result or returns do not compensate for the vastness of the new debt with its oppressive load of interest. No wonder young and enterprising Canadians come to the Northwest to make homes.—Ex.

Fergus Falls Journal: The attempt which was made by certain railroads to make all buyers of wheat adhere to the list price under threat of not giving cars to those who refused or failed to work Judge Williams of the railroad commission, in speaking of the matter said: "As long as the road only threatens we can do nothing, but in case it actually refused a man a car on this ground the commission would bring it up with a short turn. The roads know that they have no right to interfere with the price paid for wheat. No complaint has ever been made to the commission in this matter and it is understood that no road carried out the threat,"

The New York Herald was one of the strongest friends and advocates of Cleveland's election in 1884 and again in 1888. The other day it said editorially: "A split in the democratic party is inevitable if the national convention shall fix upon one of the prominent democratic aspirants in New York. If Cleveland be chosen the followers of Hill will sulk in their tents; if Hill be chosen the follwers of Cleveland will use the opportunity to settle an old feud. With either of these candidates there will be at best a lukewarmness which is equivalent to opposition." And it adds: "It is useless to plead that the party can succeed without the aid of New York State." Does this mean that the Herald thinks that Flower is the coming man?—Grand Forks Herald.

Next year is the year of jubilee for old maids. They can pop the question to their old bachelor friends and have the fun of looking into a face with a nonplus on it as big as a blanket, or it may be a smile that looks as if they were going to be swallowed it does not matter which, the old gals are going to have an opportunity that is worth more than a ticket to a circus. And if we were one of them, which unfortunately we are not we would make it it a rule to allow no guilty man to escape, We believe in the old Persian law which required all, both male and female to marry. Under this law all unmarried females were annually put up for sale as long as there were any who would buy, and when no offers were longer made then money was taken from the fund raised by sales already made and offered to those who would take those remaining and then all were married. Our leap year takes the place of this law.—Crookston Times.

The issuance of a new and smaller size postal card—"the ladies' card" so called—will make some people merry It will call to mind the forethought of the kind hearted gentleman who cut a large and a small hole in his kitchen door one for the old cat and the other for the kitten. It will be remembered how disgusted the nice old man was to observe that the kitten persistently went through the large hole notwithstanding the special provision made for her, There is no generally prevalent opinion that the ladies talk so much less than the sterner sex that they would prefer a smaller space in which to speak their minds. This great and glorious country would be guilty of the basest three-ply ingratitude if it failed to recognize the efforts of Mr. Wannamaker to please it. Let the good man issue cards no larger than a postage stamp if he will for the use of small children. We shall all save something on the decreased material consumed in their production.—Pioneer Press.

The double turreted monitor Miantonomoh is at length finished, and it is expected that she will start to sea for her trial trip tomorrow. Her completion is an event of importance to the navy and particularly to New York City of which she is expected to be the especial defender. The reconstructed monitor is the first armored fighting ship the United States has possessed since the ironclads of the period of the civil war became obsolete. Her four 10 inch steel rifles weigh twenty seven and a half tons each. They are 81 feet long and have a capacity of piercing twenty inches of solid steel at the muzzle. Each gun will use at every round a charge of 240 pounds of prismatic powder that will hurl a projectile weighing 480 pounds over an effective range of seven miles Owing to her peculiar construction the Miantonomoh offers an extremely small target to an enemy's guns, Even if her low turrets should be struck in battle it is the judgement of competent naval experts that the 12½ inch compound steel and iron armor with which they are protected would deflect the missiles without harm,

When ready for action water will be allowed to run into certain compartments of the Miantonomoh's hull until her deck is level with the waves' Nothing will remain exposed except the two turrets the smokestack and the light flying deck which can be shot away without injury to the vessel. The Miantonomoh is a slow vessel of only ten knots speed but there is no doubt that she is perfectly seaworthy and if necessary she could go around Cape Horn and whip the entire Chilian navy including the much vaunted Capitan Prat, whose construction is being hurried in the shipyards of La Seyne.—N. The Burns Holographs.

An interesting MS. volume of what is known as the "Glenriddel Collection" has just been picked up at a sale by a private collector. It contains three holograph poems by Burns. Two of these—a "bucolic" on a Nithsdale dame, and a satire on the then Duke of Queensberry—have never been published. The humor of the former is said to be decidedly "broad," and it is accompanied by a cartoon believed to be the work of Riddel, who had received the manuscripts from Burns, and the poet's friend, Grose.

Captain Riddel, of Glenriddel, was a great friend of the poet. His residence was within a mile of the farm of Ellisland, and for several years he extended toward the poet much attention. But their amicable relations were afterward disturbed through some indiscretion on Burns' part, and though he expressed much regret, Captain Riddel never had an opportunity of indicating his forgiveness. Nevertheless, Burns did not overlook his friend's kindness, and honored his memory with an elegy.

It was at Riddel's that Grose, the antiquary, became acquainted with Burns. Grose was an Englishman, and had gone north for material for a work on the antiquities of Scotland. Burns had frequent meetings with him, and entered with enthusiasm into his plans. It was to Grose that the poet addressed the lines about "the chiel amang you takin notes," and it was to gratify his English friend that the greater part of the famous "Tam o' Shanter" was written.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Captain Maguire's Devotion to Duty.

Captain Maguire, for years keeper of the Marquette light, is one of the oldest and most valued light keepers on the Great lakes. His record is such that in his old age the lighthouse inspectors have winked at an arrangement by which Mrs. Maguire has been his assistant, though this is a fog signal station, and woman assistants are forbidden by the regulations. The captain did the work, and two checks were regularly made out by the department.

In March, without giving previous notice, Mrs. Maguire decided to visit her sisters in Chicago, and on the next visit of the inspector the captain reported her for absence from the light without permission. Since her return she has regularly secured at the postoffice the check bearing her name and used the money. Mrs. Maguire's official head has now been taken off. Captain Maguire's action in promptly reporting his better half for absence from duty without permission is characteristic of the old keeper, who is one of the oldest sailors on the great lakes, and whose strict attention to his charge has made his record as a light keeper irreproachable. — Cor. Chicago Tribune.

A Skipper's Slow Trip.

"Skipper Norton" is a character indigenous to the rocky soil of the Maine coast. He is well known to the housewives along the shore as a peddler of small wares, and travels about from port to port in a little schooner, acting in the double capacity of captain and crew, despite his age—upward of eighty years. In a recent trip from Bristol, Me., to Portland harbor (where he now lies) Skipper Norton had a hard experience. Soon after leaving Bristol he encountered a heavy gale, and a sea swept the deck of the vessel, carrying overboard both anchors from the bows with hawser attached.

He was unable to draw them in again, and came all the way from Portland with both dragging. It has become a fashion to visit this quaint old sea dog, and visitors nearly always leave some substantial tokens of their appreciation of his efforts to entertain them by song, dance and yarn. He says when in port his income thus derived is from fifty cents to a dollar a day, besides what he makes from his buttons and pins.—Lewiston Journal.

Snake Bite Cured by Snakeweed.

A small negro boy, who was playing in the woods with some companions near Pine Forest, was bitten by a rattlesnake. The poison spread rapidly through the system of the boy, his body began to swell, he lost the power of sight and death was evidently approaching. Mr. Levi Dunn, who happened to be near, was attracted by the cries of the negro's companions, and ran over.

The boy by this time was in the last stages. Mr. Dunn, having heard of the curative powers of a small weed that he observed growing near, gathered a handful, and forcing it into the mouth of the negro, ordered him to chew it. Consciousness had not entirely left him, and he obeyed. The effect was almost instantaneous, the swelling disappeared and in a short time the boy was out of danger. He is now at work and all right.

The name of the weed used is "snakeweed," or "rattlesnake master."—Cor. Atlanta Constitution.

Imitation Gold.

Imitation gold is a new compound which was recently discovered and which puzzles the best jewelers to detect. Its weight is that of gold and the acid tests are the same, except that the acid boils a trifle when applied to it, although when it is wiped off no spot is left. It is cheap and is easily worked. Its chief factor is aluminium composite, from 5 to 8 per cent.—Exchange.

A peddler arrested in Shenandoah, Pa., for not having a license said that he had no faith in banks, and therefore carried all his money in his clothes. His pockets were searched before he was sent to a cell, and exactly $4,646.40 in cash was found in them.

By means of a new process devised by M. Raoul Pictet, the eminent French chemist and physicist, the manufacture of absolutely pure chloroform is now for the first time made practicable.

Few Americans have left richer legacies than James Russell Lowell, though many have left more cash. The valuation of his worldly estate is said to be only $47,000.

England and Her Great Men.

The Victorian exhibition of next winter in London is to contain 400 portraits of great men who have adorned the fifty-four years' reign of Queen Victoria. Four hundred great men is a goodly allowance for the reign of one sovereign. On looking through the list, however, the word greatness is seen to be used with a good deal of breadth. Still, they are all so far distinguished, Walter Besant writes, that their names will be known to everybody who visits the gallery and beholds their portraits.

"I wonder," he says, "how many of those who look at the catalogue will ask any awkward question—it will certainly not be asked by her majesty's advisers—as to the connection between honors and honor, between such distinction as can be conferred by rank and title and such as is gained by work and genius. For instance, the real glory of the reign will always be the immense advance of science. What honors have been granted to men of science? None. Charles Darwin, Faraday, Huxley, Tyndall, Stephenson, Herschel, Lyell, Murchison, Wheatstone—these men, in any other country which had such things to bestow, would have been made peers of that country. Here they are tossed a knighthood, in the same list with a country town mayor, a London sheriff or the clerk of a society. Again, there is literature.

"Next to the science of the reign, the literature will be its chief glory. What has been done for the authors, poets, historians, novelists of this reign? What distinctions, peerages, baronetcies or orders of Bath or Garter have been granted to Carlyle, Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Swinburne, Grote, Hallam, Froude, George Eliot, Blackmore, Freeman, Green, Lecky—names taken at random from the glorious Victorian roll? None. Nay since those men of science and literature have made distinction for themselves which no court could increase, what interest has ever been shown in them and in their work by the court? None. None whatever."

Willing to Fish Himself.

As the train was about pulling out of the Union depot Sunday a most excellent young man handed out slips bearing the title, "Where Shall We Go on Sunday?" A young fellow got one of these and was just entering the car when a lady stopped him.

"Have you read that slip?"

"Yes'm."

"Well, what do you think of it?"

"It's all right, mam," said he, politely raising his hat.

"Then you're not going off with this excursion?"

"Most assuredly; yes'm."

"Why not remain at home and attend church?"

"I would be of no use, mam, I cannot sing."

"But others can."

"That's all right, mam? But I can't talk in meeting."

"Others can talk for you."

"And I can't pray"——

"Oh, we'll pray for you"——

"And I can fish—I'm a big success at that."

"Ah, let others do your fishing for you"——

"Ah, no mam! I'm no coward, whatever I am. I want nobody lost on my account. Therefore I'll go and do my own fishing. These poor, ignorant excursionists risk their souls for me? Not much, mam. Never!"

And he politely stepped on board and was gone.—Columbus Post.

Figured in the Rebellion.

It has been stated that the last horse that sniffed the powder of the great rebellion died a short time ago, but George Mortimer, a farmer, who resides near Arlington, Va., says he can bring reliable neighbors to prove that the old bay horse which he owns and every two weeks drives into town not only followed the Union army for some time over the hills and through the valleys of Virginia, but was captured and branded by the Confederates and remained in their possession until the battle of Berkeley Springs was fought, when the involuntary renegade was recaptured by the northern boys.

Then the four footed warrior went through the remainder of the struggle with the stamp of two armies on his side. His owner states that when he was purchased in 1861 he was 10 years old, so that forty summers and forty winters have passed over his now toothless head. His partner in harness is reputed to be 35 years old, but his life has been only an ordinary one, and in personal appearance he is far below the war horse.—Washington Star.

Comfortable Fishing.

An enthusiastic fisherman in Connecticut enjoys the sport without sacrificing any of his home comforts. His residence is on the Willimantic river. From a back window he has strung a wire across to the top of a tree. Just over a very good "fishing hole" he has blocked the wire, and with a carrier and a reel he slides his baited hook, sinker and line down the wire to the block. The contact releases the reel, and as it unwinds the baited hook drops into the water and "fishing" begins. Sitting at home he can feel the nibbles and bites, and a quick motion secures his prey and pulls it along the wire to the house.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Fossil Flour.

A deposit of what is known as "fossil flour" has been recently discovered in Maine which will resist the action of acids, alkalies and oils and is a remarkable nonconductor of heat. It will be used in the manufacture of rubber goods. It contains 95 per cent. of pure silica and when mined it comes out as a fine powder.—New York Times.

A Stay-at-Home.

Mr. Frederick Hardwick, one of South Quincy's well known citizens, is away on a brief trip, and what is quite remarkable is that this is the first time since he has been married (seventeen years) that he has been away from his wife over night.—Quincy (Mass.) Ledger.

Nine persons of royal blood—one emperor, three kings, one queen, two heirs apparent, one emperor's brother and the wife of one heir presumptive (the Countess of Flanders)—slept on French soil on a recent night.

Fairs given to raise money for charitable objects have long been recognized as among the quickest means known for emptying pocketbooks and loading unwary purchasers with all sorts of things for which they have no use, and the prices demanded for the articles are said to be usually quite out of proportion to their value.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

CHAPTER I.

MAXIMA VERITAS.

"That's easy enough."

"Is it!"

"Of course it is. Besides, I always do speak the truth."

"Do you!"

"Why certainly I do! Do you mean to insinuate that I don't?"

"Oh, no! by no manner of means! There, you see I do not always speak the truth when it would be rude, for instance——"

"Blewitt! I do believe you mean to question my veracity! And I won't stand that from any man!"

"Or dangerous," pursued Blewitt, without heeding the interruption.

"What the mischief do you mean? I feel as if there was something wrong in your talk at which I ought to take offence."

"Then don't my dear Morriss! I mean to say, if you always speak the truth you are a miracle of morality; I had almost said a monster of iniquity!"

"I never told a false hood in my life; I have spoken the truth from my childhood up!" said Morriss, growing red in the face.

"Good gracious! he has not the remotest idea of how fast he is lying now!" thought Blewitt to himself.

"Falsehood!" continued Morriss, warming with the theme—"why, falsehood is the lowest, the meanest, the most degrading, the—the—the——"

"Oh yes, we know all that; but it is a necessary evil."

"And truth—Divine truth—is the most lovely, the most beautiful, the most elevating——"

"Ex-actly! Yet if this lovely, this beautiful, this elevating truth were to prevail for one day in london, there would be—such a go as never was!"

"Blewitt, you shock me."

"Yes, but truth would shock the earth! Why, the destruction of Jerusalem, the sack of Rome, the Reign of Terror, would be child's play to the horrible hubbub there would be in this world if the truth were spoken for one day! It would be confusion, distraction, perdition, and chaos come again!"

"Blewitt, I never will believe the world so bad as that—never!" exclaimed Morriss, earnestly.

"The Bible says it is—and I know it is—so wicked, so deceitful, and so self-deceiving, that it could not bear the light of truth for a single instant; for when that full light shall be poured upon the world—the Day of Judgment will have come, for this earth will be no longer habitable."

"Blewitt, I cannot agree with you; I do not believe in your theory."

"Well, test it, my dear fellow—test it in your own little orbit of duty. Speak the truth, and nothing but the truth, for one week, or even for one day, and see what will come of it!"

"What can?"

"I'll tell you, without pretending to be a prophet. If you, Joseph Morriss, nephew and heir-presumptive of John Morriss, retired cheesemonger—betrothed husband of Lizzy Bell, the prettiest girl in Little Britain; head shopman in the great haberdashery establishment of Black, Brown, White, and Green—were to dare to tell the truth for one single day, you would be kicked out of your master's shop, discarded by your sweetheart, and disinherited by your uncle; and that if you farther persisted in speaking the truth for a week, you would be clapped in a lunatic asylum as a madman too dangerous to be permitted to go at large."

"Good gracious, Blewitt! and do you really believe that I have retained all my present advantages—my uncle's affections, Lizzy's favor, my employers' trust, and my very liberty to boot, only at the price of being habitually false—and that I should forfeit them all in a week by being true?"

"Yes; that's—just—exactly—what I mean."

"I ought to hit you for it!"

"Don't; it would get you into an ugly scrape. Besides, it would be much wiser to test the facts; and, moreover, I would like myself to see the experiment tried. Come now, to make it more interesting, I will lay you a wager——"

"Betting is the fool's argument; I never bet."

"Not even at the Derby?"

Morriss was silent; but to do him justice, the all-licensing carnival of the Derby was the only exception to his rule.

"Then, as you never bet—except at the Derby—I will not tempt you to do so; but I wish to see the thing tried, and therefore I will tell you what I'll do—If you will give me your word of honor to speak the truth and nothing but the truth, for one whole week, and if you keep your word by doing so for one day, without forfeiting all the advantages I have named, and if you persevere in doing so for one week without getting put into a lunatic asylum, why, at the end of the given time, I will pay you down five hundred pounds damages for having wronged you although I am not rich."

"But I don't want you to give me five hundred pounds."

"Or I'll take a thrashing from you for the same cause, although I'm the biggest."

"But I don't want to give you a thrashing."

"Oh, well; if you'll neither give nor take, I will bribe you in another way; I will promise never to let my eyes wander towards pretty Lizzie Bell's pew, although that is my principal pleasure in going to church."

"I take you up at that!"

"It is a bargain, then?"

"Yes; but mind, by speaking the truth for a day or a week—as, indeed, I always do—I do not mean to say that I am going about voluntarily to insult everybody by telling them of their little faults, or peccadilloes, or misfortunes."

"Certainly not. You are to answer truly only such questions as are put to you, and such observations as are addressed to you in your daily routine of business or social intercourse with the little world around you."

That is simple enough. But stop—you are not to go round among our acquaintances, putting them up to ask me awkward questions which it would be painful to answer?"

"On my honor, no! All shall be fair, for I wish the experiment fairly tested. I shall not speak of the subject directly or indirectly to a single soul during the proscribed week, nor must you, should you be hard up before the end of that time, spoil all by saying to anyone—'Forgive me, for I have taken the pledge to speak the truth for a week.'"

"Certainly not. I should never under any circumstances make an apology for speaking the truth."

"Then we understand each other?"

"Perfectly. When does my probation begin?"

"At what time do you rise?"

"At seven."

"Then from seven o'clock tomorrow, being Monday, April 1st, you must begin to speak the truth, and persevere until Monday, April 8th, by which time you will be comfortably housed in Bedlam, undergoing the refreshing discipline of the straight-jacket and the shower-bath," said Blewitt.

Morriss laughed incredulously; and the friends having reached the end of their argument and the corner of the street at the same moment, parted, and each went his own way.

Blewitt and Morriss had been schoolmates, neighbors, and friends from boyhood. They were both of the same age—hopeful twenty-five. But Blewitt, the junior partner in a stock-broker's firm, was the tallest, handsomest, and richest man of the two, and consequently had seen more of life than his simpler friend.

The origin of the argument with which the chapter opens was this:—The young men had been attending evening service in a Dissenting chapel, in which a highly celebrated popular preacher had held forth upon the fearful text that "Liars shall have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone for ever and ever."

This preacher spared neither rich nor poor, age nor sex, man, woman, nor child, in his fierce denunciation of the daily, universal, crying sin of falsehood. In his notoriously blunt manner and pure Saxon, he told the lords and ladies present, whom curiosity had drawn to hear this modern John Knox, that they lied to each other, to their friends, and to the world; that they lied in their chambers, in their drawing-rooms, and, Heaven mend them, even in the church of God! He told the tradesmen and tradeswomen that their business was founded upon falsehood; the professional men that they lived by lying; and the little children that they told falsehoods by signs long before they were able to do so by speech.

He threatened them all with the warmest corner of that warm lake. Near the close of his sermon, the storm of denunciation dissolved in a shower of compassion, and with tears in his eyes, he implored his hearers "to reform" this sinful habit "altogether;" to make a beginning; to try, by the grace of God, to speak the truth, if only for a week—for a day—and see how much better it would be!

The congregation had left the church, making various comments upon this extraordinary sermon.

Blewitt and Morriss had been among the hearers. Morriss thought truth-telling an easy matter, and Blewitt took him up, and bound him by a pledge to try it for a given time, as has been said.

CHAPTER II

"THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE."

Joseph Morriss lived in Little Britain, with his bachelor uncle and maiden aunt, Mr. John and Miss Mary Morriss, of whom it need only be said, that they were ordinary specimens of elderly man and womanhood in their own class; fat as most persons are between fifty and sixty; good-humored when nobody crossed them; kind to their nephew when he pleased them, and otherwise when he did otherwise. They had retired before Joseph had returned from chapel that Sunday night, and so he went immediately up to his chamber in the third-floor front, and to bed, and to sleep, without ever dreaming of the troubles that might be in store for him.

He arose the next morning at his usual hour, dressed, and went down to the breakfast-parlor, where he found his aunt making breakfast and his uncle reading the morning paper.

"Good morning, aunt! good morning, uncle! how do you do this morning?"

"Ah, good morning, Joe! hearty! hearty! how are you?"

"Very well, I thank you, sir," was on Joe's lips, but feeling that he had the headache, and knowing that he was pledged to abstain from conventional falsehoods, he answered truly—

"I am not well, sir; I have a headache."

"What! a headache at your age? Bless my soul alive! what are the young men of the present made of? Why at your age I hardly knew I had a head, except, when it required combing! And even now, look at me now, how stout and well I look!"

"Yes, sir," was on Joseph's tongue; but he remembered that he must reply truthfully to every observation addressed to him, and so he answered—

"I don't think you look well at all, sir."

"Eh?"

"I don't think you look well."

"Eh! what do you mean? why don't I look well; sir! tell me that?"

"Because you are too fat, too short-necked, too full-faced, and—and——"

"Apoplectic you mean, sir?"

"Yes, uncle."

"By George!" exclaimed the startled and indignant old man.

"Oh, Joseph, what do you mean by saying such shocking things? cried his aunt, in consternation.

"He asked me questions, and I told him the truth," replied the young man very gently.

"Yes, and I believe he wishes that I was dead!" exclaimed the old man.

"No, uncle; I do not. I should be sorry, that is, reasonably sorry if you were to die."

"Reasonably sorry! And I suppose you would be reasonably glad of the fat legacy you expect to get from me!"

"Yes, sir, I should," replied the truth-teller.

"By George!" cried the old man, jumping up and trotting up and down the floor—"he gets worse and worse! he adds insult to insult with perfect recklessness. You, sir, answer me! what do you mean by such conduct?" he demanded, suddenly stopping in front of his nephew, and trembling with suppressed anger.

"I mean to tell the truth without fear or favor."

"You—you unnatural! ungrateful! graceless—oh!" sputtered the old man, shaking with fury.

"Oh, Joseph, what makes you behave in such a shocking manner! What have we done to deserve it?"

"I am only telling the truth, aunt."

"You know you don't mean what you say!"

"Yes, I do, aunt!"

"You don't, you know you'd be inconsolable if I or your good uncle were to die."

"No, I shouldn't, aunt!"

"Ah! you unnatural monster, you mean to kill us!" shrieked Miss Mary Morriss, throwing herself into a chair putting her handkerchief to her eyes, and bursting into tears.

"No, I don't mean to kill you, aunt; I only said I shouldn't be inconsolable if you and uncle were to die; and of course I shouldn't; no young man ever breaks his heart because his aunt and uncle die."

"Ah! you heartless young villain, you make my blood run cold!" sobbed the poor woman with hysterical passion.

"Let him alone, Molly! Say no more to him!" cried the old man, dropping into a chair and wiping his crimsoned and perspiring face—"say no more to him—we have nourished a viper in our bosoms to sting us to death at the last! But he is our dead brother's only son, and so for poor Jem's sake, if he will take back his words and say he is sorry for having uttered them, I will forgive him."

"Take back your words, my dear; say you did not mean it; your old aunty knows you didn't herself," said Mrs. Mary, removing her handkerchief from her eyes and looking pitifully at the young man.

"But I did mean it, aunt; and I cannot take my words back, because they were true."

"Then get out of my house, sir! you shall not remain in it another instant! And as for the rest, I will go this day and alter my will! I will cut you off with a shilling, sir, and I will leave all my property, barring a life annuity, to your aunt, to found a hospital for decayed monkeys! I will, sir! Come! move, sir; tramp! get out of my house!" exclaimed the old man, maddened with rage, and rushing upon his nephew, as though he would have expedited his exit with the toe of his boot.

"Not till he's had his breakfast, I beg of you, John! It's bad going out on a raw morning with a fasting stomach."

"Breakfast! he should not eat another mouthful in this house if he were starving," shouted the old man in a fury.

Tears started to Joseph's eyes; he longed to throw himself into his aunt's lap, or around his uncles neck, as he had been used to do whenever he got into disgrace in his rather naughty boyhood; but then he was pledged not to explain or apologise in telling the truth. So he only took his hat, and with a "Good-bye, uncle; good-bye, aunt," left the house.

"An ungrateful, unnatural young monster!" roared the old man, in such a frantic rage as we can only get into with those we love.

"The cold-hearted young villain! He nearly froze my blood!" Sobbed the old lady.

"My dead brother's child to turn out so! Ugh! ugh! ugh!" choked the old man.

"It is enough, it is, to make poor Jem's bones rattle in his grave!" wept Miss Mary.

"What did he mean by such an attack upon us? demanded Mr. John

SWALLOWED THE LEECH.

A Miner Who Acquired a Poor Opinion of the Bloodsucker.

The other day a couple of gentlemen, one of them a city official, were in a drug store while the clerk was tying up several leeches that the doctor had ordered. At the sight of the cotyoids the official began to smile and then broke out into a hearty laugh, the worms evidently bringing to mind some amusing incident. At last he said:

"I never see a leech or hear the word but what I think of an occurrence that happened in a small mining camp in Arizona, long before I came to Butte. In one of the mines a brawny Irishman was employed as a miner. One day he broke his shoulder and we packed him to his boarding house. The nearest doctor was thirty miles away and a messenger was sent for him. In the meantime the boys had engaged a harum scarum fellow known as Billy Moore to act as nurse for the injured miner.

"The next morning the doctor arrived, and after fixing up Pat's shoulder he left directions with Moore what to do, and also gave him some leeches, two of which he instructed him to apply to Pat's shoulder, and then went away. Pat happened to be asleep at the time and the doctor told Moore not to arouse him, but to wait until he awoke and then place the leeches as directed. As soon as the docror was gone Moore slipped out and took a number of drinks, and when he returned to Pat's room he was pretty full. Pat was awake and asked if the doctor had left any medicine for him. Moore produced the leeches and said:

"Yes, lots of it, and he told me to give you two of these when you awoke. I'll be——if I know what they are, but you've got to take 'em.'

With this he compelled poor Pat to swallow one of the leeches. The effort almost killed him, but he managed to get the thing down some way and took a big drink of water to take the taste out of his mouth. Moore then got another leech and insisted that Pat should take it also. Pat looked at it awhile and then said:

"No, Billy, I'll doi, ——it, but I'll not take another wan o' thim things." —Anaconda, Mont., Standard.

In China all the land belongs to the State, and a trifling sum per acre, never altered through long centuries, is paid for it by the occupier as rent. The soil in China is so rich that the holdings are generally very small, and it has been estimated that a square mile is capable of supporting 3,840 persons. In this country, nominally, owners of the land hold it of the Crown.

Although, however, as admitted by Lord Bramwell in letters to the Times, this is technically true, yet it is most misleading, as owners of a fee simple estate in the land in this country have for all practical purposes an absolute ownership in the land they hold. If an owner dies intestate without heirs, his land reverts to the Crown, though the owner had the power of disposal had he so wished. Under similar circumstances a man's personal property as well as his land, if he dies intestate with no next of kin, goes to the Crown.

A MOUSE ON A SPREE.

Trying to Stand On Its Head and Do Other Things.

We first became acquainted on a rainy night in October. I was sitting at my fire when I heard a faint rustling in some paper that I had dropped beside my chair, and glancing down, I saw the bright eyes of a little mouse. I say it was a little mouse, for this one was so small that it was evidently not fully grown, and as I soon saw, was not yet afraid of man.

It sat quietly watching me for a full minute when quietly extending my arm I caught it in my hand. I reached for the plate of cake at my elbow, crumbed a morsel and put it before my tiny captive. It was trembling a little, but presently, reassured; it began to nibble at the cake, pausing every now and then to glance at me with its bright, dark eyes.

Then, having further refreshed it by a drop of water proffered on a large pen's point, I placed my little prisoner in a temporary stronghold formed of an inkstand, a paper-weight and a stamp box, from which it sat watching me without the slightest appearance of uneasiness or desire to escape.

My lonliness, cheered even by the presence of this scrap of life, I resumed my writing, pausing every now and then to nod and speak to my guests. It was with real regret that I felt I must release the little creature when my work was finished, and it had another feast of cake. I heard the clock's warning that it grew late. With a parting smooth of its satiny skin with my finger, I put it on the floor, and watched it steal away under the wainscotting of the room, and saw what had escaped my observation before that the mouse was lame in one limb.

Of course, I never expected to see it again, but on the following night was glad to see it come creeping back about my feet, when I placed it once more on my table. This time, feeling rather ashamed that I had offered it the indignity before, I made not attempt to hold it in prison, but allowed it to wander about the books and papers as it would, which it did in so gentle and unobtrusive a way as not to disturb me or the articles with which the table was strewn.

My pen seemed to greatly excite its wonder, and as it hurried over the paper, Janie, as I named my mouse, would sit close to the sheet watching the letters from beneath the mysterious, swiftly traveling engine.

All that winter Janie and I kept each other company every night, two boon companions, who never bored each other with conversation, and yet were the better for the companionship. We had many a jolly midnight feast together, when Janie sat upon the edge of my plate, accepting such morsels as I proffered her, but never guilty of the rudeness of appropriating even a crumb uninvited.

On one occasion, however, there occurred a sad mishap. My landlady had brought me up a slice of the dish known as "Tipsy Squire," which, as probably you are aware, has a sauce made of wine or brandy. Not knowing this, and too busy myself to taste it just then, I gave Janie a few crumbs, and went on with my work.

Presently I was alarmed and puzzled to see my quiet little friend endeavoring to stand on her head. Not succeeding in this, she tore about the table, pausing every now and then to perform a dance and throw a half-somersault.

It finally dawned upon me what was the matter, when, I am ashamed to say, I laughed loud and long. This seemed to attract Janie's attention, for she stopped short in her frenzy and came creeping to my hand, in which she laid herself, and turned her eyes piteously, as if to say, "I know I've been unladylike. Oh! what is the matter with me?"

I made her a bed of some jeweler's cotton, and there she slept her intoxication away.

Poor little Janie! Her fate is unknown to me. One night in early Spring I looked for her in vain, and many nights after would glance up from my writing at the faintest rustle in the room, only to find that the wind was the cause, or the falling of an ember of my fire. She came no more, and though I had no particular cause to suspect him, I conceived an aversion to the household cat, and always looked away whenever he sat and licked his chops before me.—Philadelphia Times.

Iowa Corn.

The extraordinary crops of the past season throughout the greater part of the West have been matters of constant mention in the newspapers, and have inspired some funny man with the following tale, as reported in the Washington Star.

A man recently from Iowa says that he saw a farmer standing at the foot of an enormous cornstalk.

"How big is your corn?" asked the stranger.

"I don't know!" answered the farmer. "I sent one of my boys up to see a little while ago. and I'm worried to death about him."

"How so? Can't he get back?"

"No; that's the trouble. The cornstalk's growin' up faster than he can climb down."

Considerate.

The Chicago Tribune says—perhaps truly—that a minister lately paused in the midst of his discourse, evidently determined that for once the more thoughtful of his hearers should not suffer for their good behavior.

"There were five or six persons in the congregation, if I mistake not," he said, mildly, "who did not turn their heads when the door opened just now. For their benefit I will state that the sexton has just come in for the purpose of attending to the ventilation. He is attired in plain black, and wears a patch over one eye. I remark, fourthly, that this clause in the text," etc.

RICE AT WEDDINGS.

The Gauntlet the Bride and Groom Have to Run.

I wish a few heavy swells would set their faces against the hideous rice scuffle de rigueur at the close of wedding receptions. The custom of throwing rice after departing lovers comes to us from the east, where rice is a sign of plenty and prosperity. This emblematic idea is lost, and instead of a few grains softly falling, we pelt and smother and bombard our brides with thorough brutality, and finally the practice has degenerated into a senseless and unseemly fight. Formerly the "going off," with the pretty traveling toilet, the handshakings, friendly speeches, and farewell kisses was a trying epilogue to a trying drama. Now this episode is a thing of the past.

When the bride emerges, ready to start on life's journey her heart must fail at the thought of the ordeal in prospect. She says her principal adieus in private, for the guests, like ravening wolves await her below. A serried phalanx blocks the halls, lines the staircase and extends in masses to the door of the carriage. Flushed and excited faces are turned toward the victims, and every strong right hand is clenched. The bridegroom, white, determined and awkward, joins his wife, and they make a desperate rush. But it is of no avail! The upheaving hordes close upon them; the stinging grain is hurled in their smarting faces, trickles down their backs, gets into their mouths, and up their sleeves. Farewells are impossible, and no one gets a glimpse of the faultless costume evolved with such talent and time.

With the instinct of self-preservation, the bride defends herself as best she can, and the couple literally fight their way breathless and dishevelled. With a supreme effort they gain the door, bolt like rabbits into the brougham, and the couple, who have earned a little spoony peace, are forced to travel and make love with a pound of rice in the small of their backs.—London World.

A BOARD IN HER MOUTH.

Queer Cause of Loss of Appetite in a Mare.

A Morgan brood mare of vigorous appetite wouldn't eat. For two days I thought her sick. I finally turned her out and she played so much that I concluded she was well and that her teeth were troubling her. I tried whole and cut feed, ground and whole grain, green corn, oats in the sheaf and other things. Especially tempting food she would take in her mouth, only to drop it again. At last one bright morning I drew up her head by a cord around the upper jaw, and thence over a high hook, and let the sun shine into her mouth. What did I see? Front and back teeth apparently all right; tongue ditto; and the roof of her mouth—well, that did look odd. It seemed to be boarded all over. It was white, grained, polished and lower than it should have been. The ceiling of her mouth, so to speak, was certainly wood.

With a lever and a little prying to see if it were not loose the entire structure fell into her mouth and was dragged out. It proved to be a bit of inch board, 2 by 6 inches, which she had gnawed around the edges until it fitted so snugly between the teeth and their walls as to make its removal impossible for her. The lost desire for food returned instantly and the long fast was at once broken. The thought comes to me: Suppose the cause of the trouble had never been discovered until, weak from lack of food, the mare was killed to relieve her misery; would not the case have been parallel with others, where animals suffering with ever so simple a malady have been turned off or shot, unable to point out the difficulty.—Hollister Sage.

Vile cod-liver oil has lost its vileness in Scott's Emulsion and gained a good deal in efficiency.

It is broken up into tiny drops which are covered with glycerine, just as quinine in pills is coated with sugar or gelatine. You do not get the taste at all.

The hypophosphites of lime and soda add their tonic effect to that of the half-digested cod-liver oil.

FARMERS' ALLIANCE

The State Convention of the Farmers' Alliance Meets in Minneapolis.

Ignatius Donnelly Re-elected President Without Much Opposition.

MINNEAPOLIS MINN., Special—The Annual convention of the Minnesota Farmers' Alliance convened in Minneapolis with about 600 delegates present.

They were welcomed on behalf of the city by Mayor Winston, in a very appropriate speech.

O. F. Erickson welcomed the delegates in the name of the Minneapolis wage worker.

A committee on credentials was appointed, of which Andrew Steenerson of Polk was made chairman. Johnson of Pipestone was made reading clerk, Kinner of Jackson document clerk; and Greenman of Dodge assistant secretary.

President Donnelly then delivered his annual address. He opened up with some alliance statistics, then with an explanation of the failure to get out the 57,000 pamphlets containing Alliance literature. He expressed dissatisfaction with the work of the lecture bureau during the past year and said in regard to the election of a new lecturer:

We do not want to elect any man simply as an honor to him, and then have him stay at home and do nothing. You must have the strongest assurances that he will work—work—work to the utmost of his ability; for the lecture bureau is the very heart, kernel and marrow of the whole Alliance organization. This it is that has created nearly all our Alliances, and this it is that must keep them alive after they are organized.

Mr. Donnelly here opened up on the newspapers in a severe denouncement. He said:

Our plunderers know that the people have votes enough to vote them down and correct all abuses. They cannot keep us from the ballot box with guns and cannon. Their only resource is to deceive us through the agency of newspapers, which enter into every house and penetrate into every mind. The editors of these sheets are valued for their powers of sophistry and misrepresentation. They seldom attack the Alliance openly. They seek to undermine it by denouncing its honest leaders and praising its traitorous leaders. Wherever there is any difference in our ranks they seek to pry it open with crowbars of falsehood and defamation. The lying capacity of the newspapers of America is the most colossal exhibition of mendacity known in the world since the Almighty tumbled Lucifer over the embattlements of heaven. It is stupendous—it is illimitable—it takes away the breath of simple virtue and bewilders honest truth into paralysis. It threatens all our conceptions of primal right and forbodes the destruction of civilization. It is a new and terrible force in society, of which antiquity knew nothing.

In speaking of the money power in politics the sage scored the Wall street men severely.

In conclusion he gave the Minneapolis millers a roast, saying:

It would be [illegible] vator men and speculators of Minneapolis saying to the Russian farmers: "Here is a shipload of flour; we stole a thousand times as much from the farmers of the Northwest, but they are not starving, although badly mortgaged, and we thought we could give you this much, because we know we can steal another ship load any day in the year from the farmers of Minnesota. As trustee, therefore, for the Farmer's Alliance of Minnesota, we hand over to you miserable devils this noble contribution. Bow down and worship us as generous hearted men."

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The principal business of the afternoon session was the election of a president.

P. H. Rahilly, of Wabasha placed in nomination, Ignatius Donnelly.

Frank Hoskins, of Henning nominated Mr. Brandenburg, which caused considerable excitement, and some hot words passed back and forth before order was obtained.

Several other nominations were made. A ballot was then taken which resulted as follows:

Donnelly, 472; Brandenburg, 144; Owen, 4; Meigher, 1; Champlin, 4; Bjorge, 20.

Mr. Donnelly's election was made unanimous, and being called upon for a speech, he responded in a short speech of acceptance in which he scored the other political parties and gave words of advice to the Alliance adjuring the members to do all in their power to make the coming year a successful one for the movement.

Mrs. McDonald-Valesh, the state lecturer, made her annual report, which contained some very valuable information.

Then came a flood of resolutions of every color and kind. Inasmuch as the convention was not a formerly organized one, they were merely read and referred to the committee on resolutions. Many of the resolutions were pertinent and full of justice and wisdom, while others were nothing more or less than ludicrous. When the committee on credentials made its report the delegates found an opportunity to indulge in a little laughing. To facilitate matters it was moved to read the names of the counties and the number of votes each was entitled to, instead of the name of each delegate, which would take considerable time. Many of the delegates, however, were anxious to hear their names trumpeted through "the curtained halls," and so precipitated a lengthy argument by objecting vigorously. Happily, however, their ambitious desires were not gratified.

The reports were all accepted and before the convention adjourned to convene again in the evening, President Donnelly announced the following two committees:

Resolutions—Dr. E. W. Fish, chairman, Ramsey; James Hanna, Renville; A. D. Ferris, Pipestone; F. Elwell, Goodhue; H. L. Burgess, Otter Tail; P. H. Rahilly, Wabasha; Gilbert Fish, Rice; B. F. Warren, Murray; D. W. Hixon, Grant; T L. Gilbert, Redwood; W. Perkins, McLeod; George Mennie, Lincoln; Lysander Cook, Blue Earth; W. A. Hotchkiss, Filmore; J. M. Betts, Lincoln.

Constitution—A. D. Stewart, chairman, Redwood; J. J. Mouney, Yellow Medicine; J. H. Baker, Blue Earth, J Q. Cronkhite, Marshall; J. I. Vermilya, Olmsted; C. F. Bohall, Todd; P. Kershaw, Stevens; F. T. Taylor, Dakota; F. R. Davis, Lacqui Parle; Hon. F. Borchart, Renville; W Murphy, Stearns; A. Kruger, Wabasha; J Hynes, Nobles; W. Nash, Big Stone; F. M. Currier, Blue Earth.

SECOND DAY.

The first business was the election of a secretary. The following nominations were made: O. N. Kingsbury, of Fillmore; Louis Hanson, of Clay; A. L. Stromberg, of Forest Lake.

The vote was announced as follows: Kingsbury, 2; Stromberg, 284; Louis Hanson, 230.

Mr. Stromberg was declared elected.

For state lecturer, Dr. Fish, Gen. J. H. Baker and Daniel Duncan were nominated. The ballot resulted as follows: Fish, 300; Baker, 228; Duncan, 22. On motion Dr. Fish's election was made unanimous.

H. P. Bjorge, of Otter Tail was elected treasurer.

Resolved, That we demand that the governor of Minnesota, William R. Merriam, demand the resignation of our present railroad and warehouse commission and appoint a new board of commissioners that will enforce the law, or tender his resignation as governor of Minnesota.

On motion a committee of nine was appointed to investigate the grain dealers of the state as was also a similar committee to investigate lumber trusts.

Before the meeting adjourned the following resolution was adopted:

A recess was then taken to allow the delegates to caucus by districts for vice presidents. Their deliberations resulted in the following selection:

First district, T. J. Meighen, Fillmore; Second, C. H. Johnson, Pipestone; Third, H. V. Poore, Renville; Fourth, Andrew Richmond, Washington; Fifth, Jonas Howe, Hennepin; Sixth, Charles F. Bohall, Todd; Seventh, B. M. Chesley, Norman.

The finance committee of the Alliance was then named, as follows:

First district Charles Johnson; Second, Pat Gildea Murray; Third, D. F. Aitkin; Dakota; Fourth, S. W. Powell, Washington; Fifth, A. S. Neal, Hennepin; Sixth, O. G. Lyman, Stearns; Seventh Swan Nelson; Kandiyohi.

Then came the question of the selection of ten delegates to the St. Louis convention—one from each district and three at large. The districts made the selections, which were as follows:

At large, Ignatius Donnelly, chairman; First, T. J. Vermilya, Olmstead; Second, A. D. Steward, Redwood; [illegible], Ferdinand Bachen, Renville; Gilbert Fish, Rice, alternate; Fourth, E. W. Fish, Ramsey; Fifth, L. H. Schofield; Sixth, O. F. Bolwell, Todd; M. Hamilton, alternate; Seventh, Andrew Steenerson.

THIRD DAY.

The entire day was taken up with the report of the committee on resolutions.

After considerable discussion pro and con it was decided, in executive session, to join issues with the Industrial Union.

THE PLATFORM.

The following is a text of the platform adopted:

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the demands of the platforms as adopted at St. Louis, Mo., in 1889; Ocala, Fla., in 1890, and Omaha, Neb., in 1891, and industrial organizations there represented, summarized as follows:

1—The right to make and issue money is a sovereign power to be maintained by the people for the common benefit, hence we demand the abolition of national banks of issue, and as a substitute for national bank notes we demand that legal tender treasury notes be issued in sufficient volume to transact the business of the country on a cash basis, without damage or especial advantage to any class or calling, such notes to be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, and such notes when demanded by the people shall be loaned to them at not more than 2 per cent per annum upon imperishable products as indicated in the sub-treasury plan, and also upon real estate, with proper limitation upon the quantity of land and amount of money.

2—We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

3—We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain all lands now owned by alien and foreign syndicates, and that all land held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as is actually used and needed by them be reclaimed by the government and held for actual settlers only.

4—Believing the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, we demand that taxation—national, state or municipal—shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another, and that this has special reference to the tariff issue.

5—We demand that all revenues—national, state or county—shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the government economically and honestly administered.

6—We demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on income.

7—We demand the government ownership of all means of communication and transportation.

8—We demand the election of president, vice president and United States senators by a direct vote of the people.

9—That we urge united action of all progressive organizations in attending the conference called for Feb. 22, 1892, by six of the leading [illegible]

10—Resolved, That the question of universal suffrage be recommended to the favorable consideration of the various states and territories.

11—Resolved, That while the party in power in 1889 pledged the faith of the nation to pay a debt in coin that had been contracted on a depreciated currency basis and payable in currency, thus adding nearly $1,000,000,000 to the burdens of the people, which meant gold for the bondholders and depreciated currency for the soldier, and holding that the men who imperiled their lives to save the life of a nation should have been paid in money as good as that paid to the bondholder, we demand the issue of legal tender treasury notes in sufficient amount to make the pay of the soldiers equal to par with coin, or such other legislation as shall do equal and exact justice to the Union soldiers of this country.

12—Resolved, That as eight hours constitute a legal day's work for government employes in mechanical departments, we believe this principle should be further extended so as to apply to all corporations employing labor in the different states of the Union.

13—Resolved, That this conference condemns in unmeasured terms the action of the directors of the World's Columbian exposition on May 10, 1891, in which they refused the minimum rate of wages asked for by the labor organizations of Chicago.

14—Resolved, That the Minnesota State Farmers' Alliance is heartily in favor of joining with all reform organizations in the formation of the People's party, and also that we instruct our delegates to the conference, to be held on Feb. 22, 1892, to do all in their power to that end.

15—Resolved, That we extend aid to the poor of our land, including the thousands of starving miners of Indiana, and then extend aid to the suffering Russians, who are certainly deserving of assistance.

16—Resolved, That we ask that congress pass a law to compel the issuance of patents on land held by railroad corporations where they are justly entitled to them or else forfeit the same and open it to entry, to actual settlers only.

17—Resolved, That we demand that each local Alliance in the state take steps at once to organize and collect funds for the employment of counsel, and to pay the expenses of witnesses, and go before the grand jury and secure the indictment and conviction of all parties who are engaged in combinations to deprive the producers of a free market by preventing competition and lowering the prices of our productions; and that said money should be paid into the State Alliance treasury as a distinct fund, and that said fund be subject to the order of the executive committee to be used under their direction.

18—Resolved, That this Alliance takes recognition of the boycott declared by the Knights of Labor and the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial union against the Rochester (N. Y.) Clothing Exchange, and requests the sub-Alliances to take the matter up.

19—We demand that the state shall erect at Duluth, adjacent to deep water navigation, a public warehouse where grain may be stored without mixing the grain of different grades while awaiting a purchaser, at actual cost of such storage.

20—Resolved, That the Alliance of Minnesota denounces the PIONEER PRESS as an ally of the plutocracy of this age, and as a persecutor and defamer of our best men; that we rejoice in the victory won by Ignatius Donnelly in the courts over that vile enemy of the human race, trusting that the time will come when such baleful lights shall become utterly extinguished.

21—Resolved, That we disapprove of the scheme to set aside a large portion of the northeastern part of our state for a national park as a scheme for the pine land and railroad rings to secure the land for future corporation benefits; and that we believe it is a plan of English syndicates to cut us off from the Lake Superior route to the ocean.

22—Resolved, That we fully believe that $50,000 is as much money as is required to properly represent Minnesota in the world's fair, provided it is properly expended; and we oppose the levying of further tribute upon the counties with the hope of future reimbursement from the state treasury.

23—Resolved, That we thoroughly believe in independent political action to secure the people in their rights.

24—Resolved, That C. K. Davis did not fairly represent the people of Minnesota in furthering the interests of the Pacific railways in the great Pacific bond robbery, under which these roads were built.

And we demand the the immediate foreclosure by the United States of the mortgage on the Pacific railroads as a preparatory measure looking toward the nationalization of all the railroads of the country.

25—Resolved, That the constitution of the state should be so amended that every acre of land should bear a proper share of taxation, including the 7,000,000 acres of railway lands.

26—Resolved, That we demand the immediate purchase of the additional twine plants by the prison board, and its operation by the convicts; and we demand the removal of every member of the present board and the appointment of new men, a majority of whom shall be practical farmers.

27—Resolved, While we entertain no hostility to the state university we favor the separation of the state agricultural college therefrom and demand that the control of our agricultural institutions be placed in the hands of those friendly to the farmers.

28—Resolved, That we condemn option gambling in all its forms.

29—Resolved, That we ask for a thorough official investigation of the wheat combine in the Northwest. Until we secure national ownership of railways we demand legislation, state and national, making it obligatory upon all railways to furnish side track facilities at all stations sufficient to accommodate all parties or partnerships desiring to erect and maintain elevators or warehouses of a capacity of not less than 5,000 bushels each.

30—Resolved, That we sympathize with the citizens of North Dakota and Minnesota who have been ordered from their homes by the Great Northern Railroad company, and demand that the national government shall protect settlers who have received patents to their lands, as we believe that a government which does not stand by its own patents is unworthy the name of a free government.

31—Resolved, That we demand of the congress of the United States to take steps immediately to forfeit every foot of unearned railroad land.

32—Resolved, That we favor such changes in the laws of the state as will relegate all questions of local concern and the raising of revenue for local needs to the people of each county, and thus relieve the state legislature from the vast mass of local legislation that now hampers its action and prevents due consideration of matters of general interest.

33—Resolved, That we oppose the erection of a $3,000,000 capitol building at the present time, and that when such a building becomes necessary that it be removed from the metropolitan cities, and that the matter of occupying the Kandiyohi capitol lands be seriously considered by the people of this state.

34—Resolved, That in view of the fact that the actual attitude of our legislative representatives is unknown to the people; and inasmuch as the daily press distorts the proceedings of the legislature purposely, we demand hereafter the employment of a stenographer and the publication of complete reports, after the manner of the United States congress.

35—Resolved, That the board of management of the agricultural fair should all be operative farmers, and said board should abolish all gambling and saloon interests therefrom; and, that we demand a change in the laws to secure that end.

36—Resolved, That we demand the repeal of the law relating to incorporated villages, which gives them the control of all moneys derived from the sale of liquor licenses, as all such moneys should go into the county revenue and general funds, to help to prosecute the crime accruing from the sale of the same.

37—Resolved, That we favor the submission of the question of prohibition to a vote of the people.

38—Resolved, That we demand the abolition of railroad passes in all forms.

39—Whereas, the treasury notes issued under the authority of an act of the late Republican congress, July 14, 1890, are not a legal tender for all debts, public and private, when otherwise stipulated in the contract; therefore, be it

Resolved, First, that any legislation that authorizes the issuance of any money for the people that is not a legal tender for all debts, public and private, but demonetized in effect as were the greenbacks in the exception clause thereon, and the silver coin under the acts of 1873 and 1890 and the treasury notes now being issued under the act of 1891, are gross and unpardonable crimes of federal legislation.

Resolved, second, That we demand of the congress of the United States that they immediately repeal all acts of legislation that tends in any way to disturb any of the full attributes of money; and that a copy of the above resolution be sent to each of the senators and representatives in congress from the State of Minnesota.

40—Resolved, That we favor an amendment to the federal constitution empowering the people to annul all special franchises.

41—Resolved, That the liquor traffic of the country be nationalized according to the idea of Mr. Washburn of Massachusetts.

TURNING TO BONE.

An Idaho Woman Who Is Afflicted With a Peculiar Disease.

Mrs. Mollie Hughes, a highly-respected widow lady, living near Camernville, Idaho, is afflicted with a [illegible] and most distressing disease, says the St. Louis Republic. Little by little the flesh of her entire body is turning to solid bone, or, in other words, she is becoming ossified. The disease was first noticed in 1886, when Mrs. Hughes was Miss Duychink, of Canon Rapids.

At that time only a single finger was affected. Within a month after the time when Miss Duychink first noticed the numbness and stiffness of the finger it had been accidently broken off while she was asleep. The incident gave the girl no pain there being neither blood, nerves nor flesh left in the diseased member, but it excited the alarm of the family, who called in a physician.

The broken stump of the finger was amputated back to where the living flesh set on and everything was thought to be all right. Soon the flesh, muscles, arteries, veins and nerves on her hands, fingers and arms became as hard and feelingless as the finger had been before it was broken off. Next the awful malady extended to the elbows, the forearms becoming as white and as clear as alabaster.

Within the year the toes and the end of the nose and ear tips showed a like color and rigidness. The process of ossification has now been going on for five years, and the attending physicians say that it is only a matter of time when the entire body of the poor victim will be a solid bone. It is a rare disease and the pathology of it is little understood.

THE RAILWAY OFFICIAL.

It Made a Big Difference Who Went Into the Ditch.

The car rocked from side to side, and seemed as though all the wheels on one side were off the track at once. The conductor staggered along, catching hold of seats now and then to steady himself, and the pallid railway official stopped him.

"Conductor," he said, "this is an awful rough stretch of road."

"No rougher than it has always been," replied the conductor. "There's something like forty miles of it just the same right ahead of us."

"But aren't you running frightfully fast?" asked the pallid official, catching hold of the window-sill to keep from being thrown into the aisle.

"We're doing pretty well," returned the conductor, as he grabbed hold of a seat to keep from diving into the official's lap. "We're making up time. The stations are some distance apart along here, and it gives us a chance. We've got to get in on time."

"Get in where—heaven?" asked the official, as he braced his knees against the back of the seat ahead of him and took an extra strong hold on the window sill. "You signal the engineer to slow up."

"But, sir, this is the stretch you've always ordered us to make up time on, because there are so few stations."

"I have?" said the railway official, interrogatively.

"Yes, sir. Whenever we're late you wire to make it up right along here."

"I wire you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, that's when I'm sitting in the arm-chair in my office. I don't mind if you're two hours late to-day."—Chicago Tribune.

DEATH IN A DITCH.

A Monon Train Leaves the Track Near Crawfordsville, Ind., With Fearful Results.

The Coaches Filled With Helpless Passengers Roll Down a Fifty-Foot Embankment.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, Ind., Jan. 12.—To-day the north-bound Monon train ran off the track about two miles north of here at Nicholson Crossing. The accident occurred on a fifty-foot embankment down which four cars rolled, the engine and one baggage car keeping the track. The trouble is supposed to be due to a broken rail. The first passenger coach rolled over three times. It was full of passengers and caught fire from the stove but all occupants escaped alive.

The baggage and express car went over, but no one in it was severely hurt. The ladies' coach was literally torn to pieces, as was also the parlor car. Here was the greatest damage. There was hardly a passenger on the train who escaped injury. Help was soon at hand, and in a few moments the road was full of the maimed on their way to town. There were three theatrical troops on board, one of which, the City Club Burlesque company, was completely broken up, nearly every member sustaining serious injuries. The killed are:

Ben Hambur, Cincinnati; Madame Elna Van Rokey, of the City Club company.

The injured are:

Mack Rogers, Gus Rogers, Stella Clifton, Helen Love, Cora White, Syracuse, N. Y.; Fanny Everett, St. Louis; Olla Lewis, Harry C. Bryant, Philadelphia; Madge Larner, Pittsburg; M. G. Ruttledge, porter chair car; C. N. Cornwell, roadmaster; John Wilchester, Louisville, baggagemaster; George Cutler, express messenger, Louisville; William Snyder, newsboy, Chicago; William Bishop, brakeman, Lafayette; John Bills, conductor; Nellie Hanley, crushed, will die; Ezra Hibbs, Wheatfield; Mrs. Anna Hibbs, Wheatfield; Dr. E. White-Ides; Dave Malsbury, Romney; C. N. Cheek, Greencastle; ——— Fox, New Albany; Paul Allen; Thomas Monaco, of the opera troupe; C. F. Hoyt C W. Loevden, Salem; Eva Marshall, Ellettsburg; J. J. Enwright, Chicago; Melvin McKee, Chicago, not fatal.

Of this city there were injured:

John Foust, William Hall, J. M. Davidson, Matt Boutty, Mrs. Breyfogle, Will Smith, Dave Jones, J. F. Sullivan.

A number of those hurt lie here in the city, and several will probably die. The excitement has been intense, and hundreds have visited the scene of the accident. It was one of the most terrible catastrophes that ever occurred on the road. The postal car went over, but Clerks Fox and Clark, while badly cut, are not seriously hurt.

The scenes about the wreck were heart-rending. Rescuers are now searching for the body of a little girl supposed to be buried in the debris.

Important Action Inaugurated by Missouri Packers.

SIOUX CITY, Iowa, Special Telegram, Jan. 12.—The Missouri river packers, including those of Omaha, Kansas City, Sioux City, Nebraska City, Wichita and other points, are preparing for action to secure amendments to the interstate commerce law that will do away with the present discriminations in favor of Chicago.

Ed Hankinson, secretary of the Union Stock Yards company, the heaviest packer here, says the appointment of Judge McDill as interstate commissioner is a step in the right direction, but that the Western packers want more than this. They are now circulating a petition to the Trans-Missouri Freight association, asking that the rates west of the river be so adjusted that the Western packers will have the advantages that should naturally come from their position in handling Western trade. At present the rates on their products from the river to the Pacific coast is the same as from Chicago to the coast. On the other hand, the rate from the river to Southern and Atlantic coast points is much higher than that from Chicago to the same points. The packers ask the roads to change this, and Mr. Hankinson says that if they do not do so the matter will probably be laid before congress the present session.

The plan is to unite the Western interests in a demand for an increase of two in the membership of the interstate commission. The present agitation began with the decision of the commission last spring ordering the rates on live stock and packing house product to be made equal between the Missouri river and Chicago. The decision was a great victory for Chicago.

A Budget of Interesting Items Rounded Up by Correspondents.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 12.—Senator Davis to-day introduced a bill to pay Joseph R. Walker $7,000 for medical care, medicines and goods furnished the Chippewa Indians during the smallpox which afflicted that tribe in 1883. A communication from Attorney General Clapp accompanies the bill, in which he urges that the amount be paid, as it is a just and equitable debt.

The president to-day sent to the senate the nomination of Ralph K. Nichols to be register of the land office at North Yakima, Wash.

Funeral services over the remains of Rear Admiral Rodgers were held at St. John's Episcopal church to-day. The remains were afterward conveyed to Annapolis for burial.

Silver Dollar Bland introduced his usual free coinage bill to-day.

Mr. Brosius of Pennsylvania introduced a bill to-day appropriating $100,000 for the relief of the famine-stricken people of Russia.

Supreme Court Attorneys.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 12.—James A. Tawney of Winona, Representative Lind and W. R. Cray of Minneapolis were to-day admitted to practice before the supreme court. Although Mr. Lind has been in congress some four years past he has never found it necessary to be admitted. The other gentlemen expect to have cases to argue before this tribunal during the present term. Senator Davis took them to the court and introduced them. These three men are all of an age, which was quite a coincidence.

Scrambling for It.

MASON CITY, Iowa, Special Telegram, Jan. 12.—Thomas Simpson, secretary of the Winona & Southwestern, has been in the city the past few days in the interests of extending that road to this city. He says that the company will either build to this place or Manly Junction in the early spring. If it builds to Manly Junction it will extend its line westerly to Sioux City through a portion of Northern Iowa now comparatively unoccupied by railroads. Interest runs high in this and neighboring cities in the rivalry to secure the location of the road.

WILL FIGHT HARD.

Business Men Organize to Fight the National Park Scheme.

GRAND RAPIDS, Minn, Special, Jan. 12.—The subject of the national park reservation is an all-absorbing matter in this part of the state, and was still further considered by the Grand Rapids and Itasca County Improvement union at their annual business meeting on Saturday.

It is estimated that there are 1,500 to 2,000 settlers in the proposed park reservation, most of them bona fide settlers. Their representations will be at once forwarded to Senator Washburn, who is relied on to use his personal endeavors against the park. In act Senator Washburn has informed an officer of this union that he is opposed to the scheme and will help in its defeat.

It was reported to the union, and considered by it, that the immediate slice proposed to be taken off along Lake Superior about Duluth has been abandoned—presumably as a mollifier of Duluth itself. But the union secretary is in receipt of official communication from the Duluth chamber of commerce that that change will not in the least affect Duluth's attitude, but that city will fight the whole scheme to the end. The new proposed boundary is as given by map and demarkation in the PIONEER PRESS of Saturday confines this so to Duluth. But it won't work. The people of this part are additionally stirred up by the PIONEER PRESS' additional statement of the new plan as given by Mr. Fernow. Some of the points will almost exasperate the hardy pioneers, especially the proposed restriction that no road or trail shall be cut except or until designated by the park superintendent.

We settlers would be in fine condition, without road or trail until authorized by a satrap, or by Washington red tape. Also, that pasturage, and, by analogy, meadow land, can only be used by permits. Also, that ground for cultivation cannot be used except as leased by the year, or for a term of years. This would cripple many who are already raising small crops. Also, that our campers out will have to have permits to use dead and down wood. All these points have tended greatly to fire the people up, and everything in their power will be done to aid in the park defeat.

The union elected officers for the ensuing year, as follows:

President, A. G. Bernard; vice president, H. D. Kenney; [illegible] Fuller.

The union has a membership embracing most of the prominent men of this place and Itasca county, and it has begun a systematic plan of work for settling the rich agricultural lands of the county.

M'KINLEY NOW GOVERNOR.

The Protectionist Champion Inaugurated Governor of Ohio.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Jan. 12.—William McKinley, Jr., was inaugurated governor of Ohio to-day with an imposing pageantry and numbers unexampled in the state's history. His great name is now linked in the annals of this proud old commonwealth as the successor of a long line of illustrious men in the gubernatorial chair, one of whom became president and another chief justice of the supreme court.

Notwithstanding the severity of the winter weather, the city was crowded with people from all parts of Ohio and large delegations from neighboring states. Not since the national Grand Army encampment of 1888 has Columbus been the theater of such crowds and such enthusiastic demonstrations. The grand occasion was non-partisan, the political friends and foes of the new governor all joining with the utmost harmony and zeal in the inauguration exercises and parade. All the state institutions and city schools had a holiday to witness the grand demonstration, than which Ohio's capital never saw on any grander scale or with more enthusiasm.

In speaking of Ohio's representation at the world's fair, the governor said in his inauguration address that not only should the state legislature see to it that ample provision be made to have a creditable exhibit, but the people and their representatives should also urge upon congress to take such action as will make this exposition worthy of the great event it celebrates, and worthy also, of the dignity and honor of the nation. In regard to the re-districting of Ohio under the new census for representatives in congress the governor urged that the districts be apportioned with perfect fairness and with no taint of partisanship.

He recommended the creation of a state tax revision commission, and spoke of the great need in many sections of Ohio of good country roads, which affect every material interest of the state and are receiving very general attention throughout other states in the union. Gov. McKinley also recommended the appointment of a canal commissioner, which should make a complete report as to the canals of Ohio.

This evening from 8:30 to 10:30 o'clock Gov. and Mrs. McKinley held a grand reception to the public at their headquarters, the Chittenden hotel.

The price of wheat has been steadily going down the past week and No, 1 hard is only worth 69 cents today. It is impossible to predict how much lower it will go.

Wheat has been moving very slowly the past week owing to the low price and the extreme cold weather, If the price would raise and the weather moderate we would undoubtedly have a rush again.

The cold weather has stopped all threshing. It is estimated that fully thirty five per cent of the wheat is still in the stack. A good many will thresh before spring but many will be compelled to wait until after seeding.

Only one class of businessmen gives a bad report for 1891. This is the insurance men. Disasters by fire water and accident were uncommonly numerous last year, The fires were so destructive that some of the companies talk of increasing their rates. The amount that went up in smoke in 1891 is placed at $130,000,000.—News.

The New York World has been polling the New York legislature on its presidential preferances. There were 83 Democrats interviewed and 75 Republicans. Of these 53 favored Hill, 50 Blaine 6 Harrison, 4 Cleveland, 1 Depew, 1 Flower, 26 Democrats were non-committal and 17 Republicans refused to vote. This is a good straw, and shows a pretty stiff breeze blowing in one particular direction in each camp.—Journal,

When will the farmers make a change and get into the market with something besides wheat.—Paynesville Press.

In connection with the policy of the Democratic house in refusing to furnish ships to carry the Russian Relief collection to the starving Russians it is interesting to note that railroads have very promptly and willingly agreed to haul the stuff to the seaboard without expense The obstructionists in the house will have to get out of the way, Public sentiment is outraged by the attitude of these demagogues, so clearly taken for political effect. It is having an effect, all right enough, and a very striking effect, but it is not the kind of an effect that was aimed at,—Journal.

The proverb that "nothing is so cowardly as a million dollars unless it be two million dollars" should perhaps be revised to read that nothing is so cowardly as a millionaire unless it be a multi-millionaire, A methodical and painstaking crank has been on the trail of Jay Gould ever since the Sage incident and by writing the wizard letters showing the greatest familiarity with his movements and those of his family, in spite of the vigilence of a drove of private detectives, has worked the railroad king into a very unhappy condition. The crank demands a modest $10,000 as the price of sparing Mr. Gould's life.—Pioneer Press.

The death of the Khedive of Egypt may have far reaching effect on European politics. It has aroused to activity the jealousy of France and the hostility of the Sultan toward the British occupation of Egypt. France proposes an appeal to the powers which means Russia, to require England to withdraw, and England through the inspired newspapers of the Tory government, gives notice that she means to hold on. The cloud will probably pass away but sudden and unlooked for occurrences of this sort indicate that chance, rather than design, may eventually set ablaze the beacons that will summon armed Europe to the decisive conflict of the century,—N. This gives a total of 1226 entries aggregating 16?,871.20 acres and the total cash receipts during the year have reached $59106.86.—Crookston Times,

On the fourth of last November a young girl named May Newman, aged 14 years whose parents reside about two miles from Thief River Falls, came to this city to work at the Germania House She was a good, faithful domestic, and all went well until just previous to Christmas when a man giving his name as George F. Schoonover and claiming to be a special deputy U. S. Marshal stopped at the hotel.

From the start it was apparent that he was a lover of the fair maiden, and Joseph Netzer, who was befriending the girl, suspected an elopement, and had a talk with the girl, telling her if she wanted to go home he would go to the train with her. She stated that she had written to her father and expected a reply. Nothing more transpired until New Years it was found that the girl was missing. Schoonover remained until the Sunday after New years when he too decamped,

It was thought that May had returned to her parents but a letter written to Thief River Falls states that the girl is not home and requests Mr. Netzer to hold her here until her paternal arrives,

As the bird has flown, the question asked now is, "Has she eloped with her beloved?"—Crookston Times.

Otis Staples employed by the government as superintendent of timber inspection on the White Earth and Red Lake Indian reservation, was at the capitol yesterday in company with state Timber Inspector Westby. Mr, Staples has under his direction a crew of six men who are engaged in making an estimate of the amount of timber standing on the reservations named, and the entire party left for the scene of their work last night, They go by way of the Northern Pacific railroad to Fosston, [illegible] White Earth. It is expected that the work of estimating the White Earth reservation will be finished by March 1, when more men will be put on and an estimate made of the vast timber tracts on the Red Lake reservation. M. P. DeWolf and E. L. Brockway, two of the most thorough timber experts in the country, gave the Tribune reporter some interesting figures relative to the Red Lake Timber supply. Mr, DeWolt has been over the entire territory and has formed a rough estimate as to the possible amount of pine on that reservation. He says that by the time the land comes into market the reservation will contain the enormous amount of 10,000,000,000 feet of timber. Of this amount one-eighteenth or in round numbers, 550,000,000 feet will become the property of the state school fund. At an extremely low estimation this will add eventually $1,000,000 of the state school fund.—Minneapolis Tribune.

St. Paul Jan. 4.—Among the guests at the Merchants today are O. M. Towner and S. R. Briggs, who register from Chicago but who are largely interested in North Dakota and Northern Minnesota. This fall and winter they have spent in Ohio Indiana and Illinois, looking up prosperous farmers who desired to move west and inducing them to locate in the northern part of this state and North Dakota. Early in the fall Towner visited the section named with about thirty representative farmers from various sections in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, These gentlemen returned home filled with enthusiasm and admiration for the new country and readily corroborated stories of enormous crops told by Towner when he visited their localities this winter. As the result 1,000 settlers have been secured for the Red River Valley and surrounding country where they have secured good farms for all of them. They will move early in the spring and will bring with them many farm hands who are badly needed in that country They expect to locate many more before spring opens. E. C. D. Shortridge of Larimore, president of the North Dakota Farmers' Alliance was at the Merchant's this morning and held a conferance with Towner and Briggs. "More settlers and more farm help is what we want in North Dakota" said he; "the alliance of my state takes far more interest in immigration than in politics. We want to see farm hands, not candidates for political offices, just now. Offices can take care of themselves for the time being. We must care for farms and the coming crop which promises to be fully as heavy if not heavier than the last one.—Pioneer Press.

About Sailing a Sloop.

The sloop differs from the "cat" essentially. A catboat is propelled by driving sail only; the sloop has both driving sail and pulling sail, for she carries, in addition to the mainsail of the catboat, a headsail called the "jib." The mainsail, as you know, tends to "luff" the boat's nose into the wind, but the jib has the reverse effect and tends to force the bow off and away from the wind. These sails, if properly proportioned, cause the yacht to keep a straight course, to steer easily and to sail without burying her head; for the jib lifts the bow, and the mainsail, being set back near the middle of the boat, does not drive her "down by the eyes," as does the sail of a catboat. In sailing a sloop, however, great care must be exercised, for this little jib is a treacherous sail and will lead you into trouble if you do not understand its wayward tricks.

The rules for sloop sailing are briefly these: Before "going about" cast off the jib, before coming to anchor or rounding up to a mooring lower the jib, when a squall strikes cast off the jib. In fine, get rid of the jib first and work your boat with mainsail alone in all emergencies that occur when sailing to windward. In running before a strong wind a reefed mainsail and a full jib give the best results, and sloops are better than catboats when running free, because the jib counteracts the tendency to luff, to steer hard and to roll, all of which traits are ever present in the frisky catboat.

Observe one rule at all times when sailing a sloop: Never fasten the jib so that it cannot instantly be cast off. Fastened jib sheets cause nearly all the capsizes which occur in sloop sailing.—F. W. Pangborn in St. Nicholas.

Spectacles or Tongs.

They tell a good story of Chief Justice Peters, of the supreme court of Maine, one of the brightest and wittiest ornaments of the bench in that state or any other.

While the judge was still a practicing lawyer he had for a client a farmer named Hanscom, who, though he was well past middle age, had the notion not uncommon among Maine farmers of his age that he was as young as ever and could hold his own in a mowing field with the best of them.

One day the farmer came into the judge's office to look at some papers which had been drawn up for his signature, and as he picked up the first one he began to adjust it in the manner sometimes spoken of by those who use glasses and mislay them as "telescoping."

The judge noticed the action and, seeing that the farmer was holding the paper pretty well at arm's length, remarked pleasantly:

"Your eyesight seems to be failing a little, Mr. Hanscom. "You will have to get a pair of spectacles."

"Not a bit of it," growled the old farmer; "not a bit of it. My sight's as good as it ever was. I shan't want 'spectacles' for a good many years yet."

"All right," said the judge; "you'll have to get a pair of tongs then."—Detroit Free Press.

A Spoiled Child.

"English children are so much more childish than ours," said an American mother once. "I wonder why it is."

It is undoubtedly because they are kept in the nursery and do not come into prominence at so early an age as ours do. The other day in a hotel rotunda stood a round eyed darling with her short, golden hair fluffed around her winsome face; her short waisted, long skirted frock added to her picturesque appearance. Almost all the men passing by stopped to speak to her. She was the delighted recipient of nickels, cards and bonbons, while she coquetted with all the airs of a society girl. My heart ached, for she was getting all the sweet, downy freshness of childhood rubbed off so early.

Her father, standing near, encourged her and laughed at her naive questions and replies. By and by the white capped nurse came on the scene and bore her child away; and she, loath to leave the scene of her conquests, made her exit, biting, kicking and scratching her nurse, while the men laughed heartily at this edifying spectacle.

There are some wise mothers who discourage and endeavor to suppress this precocity, but they are lamentably few in number.—L. E. Chittenden in Housewife.

The Manfaced Crab.

One of the most singular looking creatures that ever walked the earth or "swam the waters under the earth" is the world famous manfaced crab of Japan. Its body is hardly an inch in length, yet the head is fitted with a face which is the perfect counterpart of that of a Chinese coolie; a veritable missing link, with eyes, nose and mouth all clearly defined. This curious and uncanny creature, besides the great likeness it bears to a human being in the matter of facial features, is provided with two legs, which seem to grow from the top of its head and hang down over the sides of its face. Besides these legs, two "feelers," each about an inch in length, grow from the "chin" of the animal, looking for all the world like a colonel's forked beard. These manfaced crabs fairly swarm in the inland seas of Japan.—St. Louis Republic.

Prussic Acid and Instant Death.

Prussic acid, it is suggested, causes a painless and immediate death, and is therefore preferable to electricity in closing the career of criminals. First make the condemned man unconscious with an anæsthetic, then a few drops of prussic acid injected into the jugular vein with a hypodermic syringe will cause instantaneous death.—Yankee Blade.

Not a Case for Treatment.

A stout, middle aged woman fell on a street in New York, and when some one attempted to raise her to her feet she declared, with tears and groans, that her leg was broken. An ambulance was hastily summoned, the woman lifted tenderly in and taken to a hospital, when it was found that the broken limb was artificial.—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Bradlaugh Library.

Mr. Bradlaugh's daughter has published the priced catalogue of her late father's library, in the form of a substantial pamphlet. With a view to make it not merely a descriptive list of books but a memento of their original possessor, two photographic portraits are added, together with a fac similie signature. The books number in all 7,000 volumes, exclusive of pamphlets and blue books. They comprise, as his daughter says, only a few rare bindings and comparatively few costly first editions, but such as they were he valued them.

"Twice," she adds, "within recent years he thought he should be obliged to sell them to meet legal expenses. The first time it was to pay government costs during his parliamentary struggle; the second occasion was after the Peters and Kelly case. Each time the sale was happily averted, but the anticipation of the possibility brought extra lines to his face and bitterness to his heart. Last December, when he was feeling ill and in want of a rest and change, which he had no money to procure, I asked him 'Why not sell two or three of the more valuable books? If you could get health with the money they would fetch, it would be well worth the exchange.'

"'Ah: my daughter,' he answered with a sad half smile, 'when I have to part with my books'— I was anxious about him and ventured to press him further, but he only shook his head, saying, 'It is of no use arguing the matter.'"—London News.

Bad Boys and a Turtle.

The boys have been keeping the fire department busy of late. Some boys caught a turtle and poured oil over it, near the city's house for storing naphtha, on Dwight street, then set the shell on fire. The turtle ran up to the door of the house, and in an instant the whole interior was in flames. An alarm was sounded, and the department worked over two hours before the flames were subdued.—Holyoke (Mass.) Cor. Springfield Republican.

The Lord Told Her to Sing.

The Baptist chapel at Leytonstone was crowded on Sunday because of an announcement that Madam Antoinette Sterling would sing during the service. She not only sang, but at the prayer meeting which followed joined in prayer and delivered a short address. It may not be generally known that the famous contralto is a believer in the doctrine of the Inward Light.

A pretty story is told about her in this connection. She was present at one of the Quaker meetings at Devonshire square, and the brethren and sisters remained some long time without the spirit moving any of them to utterance. At last Madam Sterling got up and sang "O Rest in the Lord," which created no small stir. The clerk afterward approached her, and said, "Thee knowest, sister, it's against the rules; but if the Lord telleth thee to sing, thee must!"

It was probably through her recollection of this incident that Mrs. Margaret Lacy, the sister of that old tribune of the people, John Bright, called in her last illness for "the singing sister." Needless to say, Madam Sterling went.—British Weekly.

An Organ Grinder's Sparring Combination

An organ grinder who has been in this city for a month has a scheme which is making him a small fortune.

Instead of the customary one monkey this industrious son of Italy carries two. When he stops the ordinary tricks of climbing and begging are dispensed with, the monkeys are set to fighting and bets are made by the owner with any of the spectators who are so inclined as to which monkey will win.

The owner's bets are freely taken, and they rarely go against him. The result is that where, under the old method, he would probably receive a few nickels he now receives dollars.

A reporter watched the man with the monkeys for nearly an hour in front of the new city hall, where he was surrounded by a large crowd, who were freely contributing their quarters, halfs and dollars to the coffers of the musician.—San Francisco Chronicle.

May Yet Have a Monument.

Interest has recently been revived in the proposed Garfield monument, a fund for which was started in the fall of 1881 shortly after President Garfield's death. The fund was limited to dollar subscriptions, and 604 persons subscribed. Then the affair collapsed, as far as public interest was concerned, and Dec. 11, 1883, H. B. Duncan, treasurer of the fund, placed the $604 on deposit in the Wilmington Savings fund. The interest increments since that time have increased the principal to the sum of $837.05. There is talk now of making an effort to increase the fund to a limit sufficient to admit of the erection of a suitable statue of the dead president in one of the city's public parks.—Wilmington Every Evening.

What One Cow Did.

That a cow has a wonderful appetite when she gets into a neighbor's field was clearly shown in Indiana, where the injured owner proved in court that one ordinary brindle cow destroyed in one afternoon the following property: Two 4-year-old cherry trees, 7 apple trees, 5 pear trees, 1 plum tree, 100 heads of cabbage, 12 rows of beans 5 rods long, 1 row of beets 1½ rods long, 50 to 150 sweet potato plants, 1 bed of onions, 3 grapevines and 14 blackberry bushes.—Boston News.

Lightning in and Near a Church.

Two hundred persons were assembled at divine service in the Mower Hightower church, near Osborn, Ga., when a bolt of lightning entered the edifice. Some of the people were rendered senseless, others had their clothing torn from their bodies, several were burned and every one bore more or less serious marks of the lightning. Although no person was fatally injured, a horse that stood outside the church was instantly killed by the electric fluid.—Yankee Blade.

Novel Matches.

A new method of obtaining a light has just been patented in England. Instead of the old fashioned safety match, the stick is tipped at both ends, one end with the usual composition and the other with that found on the scratcher outside the box. Light is obtained by breaking the match in the middle and rubbing the two ends together.—Exchange.

Nine persons of royal blood—one emperor, three kings, one queen, two heirs apparent, one emperor's brother and the wife of one heir presumptive (the Countess of Flanders)—slept on French soil on a recent night.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

"I don't know," responded Mrs. Mary, in dispair; "but, poor fellow! and after all, he isn't right in his head! he said he had the headache, and he certainly acted very strange—which I noticed he looked queer about the eyes when he came downstairs," said the poor old woman, drawing boldly upon her immagination for the last-mentioned symptom.

"Did you though?" inquired the old man, turning around briskly.

"Yes I did, and I shouldn't wonder if his poor head was a going, dear boy! And it is all along of his measuring out endless yards of ribbon and lace, and talking endless rubbish to get them off all day long, and poring over everlasting rows of figures in them ledger-books all night There's just where it is; and it'll be a pretty set out if you have gone and turned your luny nephew out o'doors."

"Pooh! nonsense! he was no more luny than you or myself. It was his natural depravity cropping out, that's what it was, and I'll have nothing more to do with him!" exclaimed old John, relapsing into anger.

"Well, you'll see. He is luny. If he hadn't 'o' been he'd never said nothing to hurt our feelings. He never did before!" sobbed the old woman.

"I'll disinherit him! and he shall never darken my doors again!" persisted the old man.

"And here endeth the first lesson!" sighed poor Joseph to himself as he took his dejected way towards his place of business. "I have scarcely begun to speak the truth for one hour before I am turned out of doors and disinherited—Ah! I beg your pardon, Miss Robinson!"

In the absorption of his mind he had run against a stout woman, who came sailing along like a frigate under full canvas, with her expansive hoops, crinoline, and flounces filling up the whole breadth of the pavement.

"He! he! he! whatever could you have been thinking of, Mr. Morriss?" giggled the woman.

"Of my aunt and uncle, Miss Robinson," said Joseph, letting his eyes rove abstractedly over her showy person.

"Your haunt and huncle! la, what a dutiful nephew! But—he! he! he!—you are looking at my bonnet; now arn't you?"

"Yes."

"He! he! he! well, since you are so candid, how do you like it?"

"Very well in itself—not at all on you."

"Why so, sir, pray?"

"Because it doesn't suit you."

"And why not, I should like to know? Now tell me candidly as I know you've got a deal of taste."

"Then, candidly, I think the bonnet too light for such a heavy woman; too young for such an old woman, and too fine for any waiting-woman."

"Pray, how do you know anything about my age, sir?" exclaimed the indignant Miss Robinson, reddening violently.

"By three sure tokens: the stoutness of your figure, the thinness of your hair, and the weakness of your eyes; these symptoms, taken all together,

"Mr. Morriss, you insult me, sir.

"Miss Robinson, I did not wish to do so; but you asked my opinion, and I gave it to you truthfully."

"You as much as said I was a stout, hold waiting-woman, sir, overdressed."

"Something like it, I admit."

"You are a hintolerable, himperent, hignorant fellow!" exclaimed the irate abigail, bouncing off.

"There, now," said Joseph to himself, "I've made another enemy by answering truthfully the questions that are put to me—an enemy of Helen Lyle's waiting-woman, to whom I would not have offended for the world! For the world! hump! It is well I did not utter that aloud, for it was a fib. I would offend her for the world, though I wouldd't for a mere trifle. Oh, this habit of fibbing! When we don't fib to others, we fib to ourselves, though there's no need of it. But confound this telling of the truth! It is likely to get me into more scrapes than I shall ever get out of. I wish people wouldn't make any inquiries of me, or address any observations of me for a whole week. We boys used to say, when we didn't want to tell each other anything unpleasant, 'Ax me no questions, and I'll tell you no lies.' I wish I had the right to say to all inquiries, 'Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no truths!' Confound this truth-telling, I say again; though I need not say it, as the whole place is likely to be confusion worse confounded before I've done telling the truth."

The end of this soliloquy brought Joseph Moriss to the fine plate-glass fronted establishment of Messrs. Black, Brown, Green, and White, drapers, and outfitters.

Meanwhile Robinson, in a red rage, rushed up to and intruded herself upon every acquaintance she had among the tradespeople in Little Britain, asking—

"Hisn't there something very hodd about that impudent fellow, Morriss, hin at Black's. I was hat the shop this mornin to give an horder for Miss Lyle, and has I was coming hout I met 'im hin the street, where he behaved most improperly."

"La, Miss Robinson, and he such a modest-looking young man," said Lizzie Bell, the little milliner, who happened to be the first person addresed.

"Modesty or not, 'e hinsulted me most grossly, and I believe 'e was very much intoxicated."

"La! and he such a steady young man, and this so early in the morning."

"Then 'e was hevidently out of his 'ead!" exclaimed the abigail, reddening with anger.

"Good gracious me, Miss Robinson, how did he insult you? whatever did he say or do?"

"I leaves you to himagine, Miss Bell," replied the abigail, with a flaming face, flouncing out of the shop, for she had no idea of repeating Joseph's plain truths to her own disparagement.

And the pretty little milliner stood in perfect consternation at the implied fact that the handsome young shopman had had the shocking bad taste to make love to a big, flaunting, middle-aged waiting-woman, who confounded her H's.

"And goodness gracious me, he must have been out of his head, sure enough," she said, as she resumed her duties behind the counter.

This conversation was, with little variation, repeated at at least a dozen shops. And so, by the diligent rolling of the ball, in the course of two hours at least one half of his acquaintances in Little Britain was sure that there was something wrong about that poor young fellow Morriss.

CHAPTER III

EHEU JOSEPHUS!

Meanwhile Joseph Morriss entered the fine front shop of his employers.

"Mr. Morriss," said the second parteuer, advancing to meet him, "you are late; but I have no wish to find fault with one who is generally so punctual as yourself. Here, I want you to see these choice brocades and moires carefully packed. They are to be sent down to Streatham to Miss Lyle for examination this evening. And I should be particularly obliged if you would go down yourself with the parcel. It is no part of your business, I know but we don't like to trust so valuable a parcel to our new shop-boy. And besides, it would look like attention for you to go down; and she is one of our most profitable customers. Her woman was here this morning, and gave an extensive order, and desired these silks to be sent down for her mistress to look at this evening. So if you have no objection I should be especially obliged to you to go with them."

"I will go with great pleasure, sir," answered Joseph, with a beaming countenance, delighted, perhaps, to be able to make an answer at once truthful and polite.

Poor boy! he had begun to fear that he was never to open his mouth without giving offense or making an enemy.

"That's like you, you are very obliging. And do you know, you good-looking fellow, that I think she would like you to go down to her villa; I have noticed that when she comes to the shop herself she always wants you to serve her; and if one of us old fogies of the firm go to wait on her, to show our respect, she looks bored, and doesn't like anything we show her, and gets up and says she will call again. Ah, you young scapegrace, it's a fine thing to be five-and-twenty, with nice auburn hair and whiskers!" said Mr. Brown, passing his hand over his shining ivory pate. Joseph Morriss reddened with the ingenuous blush of modest young-manhood, as he answered truthfully—

"Yes, it is."

The partner looked up in mild surprise at this very candid reply, saying to himself—

"The conceited young puppy! Is he as vain as all that? Yet no, he cannot be, for he is blushing now at the imputation of being admired by an heiress. I must have misunderstood him. Then speaking up, he said—

"And I have something else to tell you, Morriss, and, mind, it is a secret yet. Come this way.

The young man followed his principal to a covert behind some hanging dresses, and continued—

"You see I wish to have the pleasure of telling you the first myself, and as I am going down to Paisley to buy goods this morning, I shall not have another opportunity."

Joseph looked interested and curious. Mr. Brown glanced around to see that there were no eavesdroppers, and continued—

"Well, you see, on Saturday night, partners and myself were having a snug little supper together at the [illegible] rum name for a tavern, isn't it?

"It is a queer combination of subjects," replied the young man.

"And not so queer neither, for I am sure, if my cook would always send me up such juicy, well-broiled steaks and chops as we get there, I should call her an angle at the gridiron! Ha, ha! ha! good, that, though I got it off myself—isn't it?

"Not so very answered the truth-teller.

"What does he mean?" asked Mr. Brown of himself; "I don't understand him this morning: he is certainly queer."

But being too much interested in the matter he had to communicate to fly after any collateral subjects, he passed it by and continued—

"Well, as I was saying, we were all snugly seated at supper in a private room of the Angel and Gridiron, when we began to talk of you—of your intelligence and fidelity, and pleasing manners, and popularity among the ladies, and—a—a—in short, we thought it would be the right thing to take you into the firm, and give you a fair share of the business."

"Oh, Mr. Brown!" burst forth the young man in a fever of gratitude and delight.

To be made a member of the firm at some far distant day, after years of faithful service and careful saving, had been the goal of his loftiest earthly ambition; but to be taken in now, without capital, merely upon account of his personal worth, was rapture.

"Hush! don't break out in that way; you'll be overheard, and the affair is a dead secret as yet. There, the shop is half full of customers, and we must bring our conversation to an end. Yes, you see Black is going to retire altogether from business, and I shall be the senior partner."

"I wish you joy, sir."

"Yes, and congratulate yourself, too, for I think I shall make a kinder master than our rather tyrannical head, Black. But at all events, after the First of May proximo, the firm will be styled, 'Brown, Green, White, and Morriss,' if you raise no objection."

"Oh, Mr. Brown, my heart——"

"Yes, I know—I know. Well, that's the secret. Now, you know the others wish to surprise you, therefore you are not to go and say that I told you."

"No, not unless they ask me."

"Oh, they are not going to do that; they will be mum until the time comes. And now I am off to Scotland; and you had better go and attend to those ladies looking at the prints."

So Mr. Brown departed, and the young man took his accustomed place behind the counter to wait upon the customers.

"You are sure, now, that these colors will not fade?' inquired a young lady, examining a neat cotton print.

"No, miss, I am sure they will fade," replied the truth-teller.

"But they are ticketed fast colors,' so how do you know they will fade?"

"Because an old lady bought a dress of them last week, and washed a piece, which faded quite out, and she came here on Saturday and made a complaint about it."

"I should think she might; but you ought not to ticket prints 'fast colors,' unless you are quite sure that they are so."

"No, miss, I know we ought not."

"And now that you have found out they fade, you should take the ticket off."

"Yes, miss, I know we should."

"What, are not those tickets taken off yet?" exclaimed the senior partner Black, coming up in a great bustle. "Take them off at once, Mr. Morriss. We never warrant any colors but what we know to be fast. What else can we show you miss?" he inquired, turning deferentially to the young lady.

"Nothing, thank you; I will call again," she said, gently bowing herself out of the shop.

As soon as she was gone, the whole manner of the proprietor changed. Turning sharply around to Morriss, who was engaged in tearing off the "fast colors" tickets from the aforesaid prints, he said, harshly—

"Let those tickets be, Morriss! What possessed you to tell Miss Simpson that the colors would fade?"

"Because it was true. Old Mrs. Rubb, who bought a dress of it last week, on the strength of those tickets, brought back a piece of washed out to a browny white."

"But you needn't have told Miss Simpson that. You ought to have left her to find out for herself after she had bought and paid for the dress."

"But that would have been too late, sir."

"What of that? We must shave a little, I suppose. And if we let people know that this piece of goods will fade, and that will fray, and t'other cut out, we had better put up our shutters at once. I'm astonished that you should have been in our shop so long without knowing better than to act as you have done! Be careful not to make such mistakes in future," and so saying, Mr. White stalked off.

Poor Joseph! he had scarcely drawn his breath after this blowing up, before his truth and courage were put to a fresh trial,

"Show me some good cheap flannels, like them marked up at the window—'Real Welsh, all wool, elevenpence three farthings a yard,'" said an old lady, coming up to the counter.

With a sigh at the prospective cross-examination, and a hearty hope that the old lady might take everything for granted, and ask no questions, Joseph took down a roll of flannel, and displayed it before her.

"Now is this just the same as that in the window?"

"It is just the same sort of goods."

"And is it real Welsh?"

"N—n—o, mum; it is not."

"Isn't it?—but it is marked so in the window! Hows'ever, it feels like a good bit of flannel; and it's all wool?"

"No, mum; it is slightly mixed with cotton."

"Mixed with cotton! Why it's marked 'All Wool in the window' what makes you put things in the window that ain't true? Hows'ever, it do feel a good bit of flannel for all that, and cheap enough at the price, if it do not shrink badly. Will it, do you think?"

"Yes, mum, very badly."

"La! how do you know?"

"Because my aunt bought some to make up for herself, and it shrank so badly that she said it was fit for nothing but scouring cloths."

TO BE CONTINUED.

Voracity of a Python.

A story of unusual voracity and daring on the part of a python comes from Muka, Borneo. At Judan, a vil- his son, aged from 10 to 12 years, were sleeping in their house, inside a mosquito curtain.

They were on the floor near the wall. In the middle of the night, says the Sawai, Borneo, News, the father was awakened by his son calling out. The lamp was out, and the father passed his hand over his son, but found nothing amiss, so he turned over and went to sleep again, thinking the boy was dreaming. Shortly afterward the child again called out, saying that a crocodile was taking him. This time the father thoroughly aroused, felt again, and found that a snake had closed his jaws on the boy's head. He then pried open the reptile's mouth and released the head of his son, but the beast drew the whole of his body into the house and encircled the body of the father.

He was rescued by the neighbors, who were attracted by the cries of the terrified couple. The snake, when killed, was found to be about fifteen feet long. The head and forehead of the boy are encircled with punctured wounds, produced by the python's teeth.

The Horrors of the Slave Trade.

The African slave trade is yet carried on to such an extent that a thousand lives are sacrificed every day in the year. Indeed it is doubtful whether in the most barbarous periods of human history there has been any greater barbarity than the African slave trade of to-day. For years there has been constant agitation in Europe for the civilized governments to unite in some action to suppress it. The result of long deliberation was the Treaty of Brussels, which every leading European power except France has now signed; and France and the United States are the only two important powers which have not yet affixed their signatures to it. The treaty cannot go into effect except by the ratification of all the civilized governments, and if it go into effect there is every reason to believe that very much of the slave trade will be abated. The Treaty of Brussels is now before the senate of the United States, and an explanation of its benefits and of our duty in the matter is made in the January number of the Forum by Judge Lambert Tree, Tale Minister to Belgium.

Snake Diet for Catfish.

A few days ago a fisherman by the name of Thompson, living near Swallow Rock, on the Big Muddy River, caught a catfish weighing sixty-two pounds. When he hung the fish up to clean he noticed a snake stick its head out of the fish's mouth and then dart back inside again. When the fish was cut open the snake was found comfortably coiled up in its stomach and seemed to have made this its permanent home for some time. The snake was a water moccasin, and measured 27 inches in length. His snakeship did not like the idea of giving up his comfortable quarters, and showed a disposition to fight, whereupon he was quickly dispatched.

RODE A HORSE UPSTAIRS.

A "Bad Man" in Memphis Shows His Nerve in a Remarkable Way.

The story of a remarkable feat of horsemanship performed in Mempis recently has just come out. The rider was Henry Douglass, a farmer living near Lake View, Miss., and he rode his horse up a steep flight of stairs to the second story of M. C. Pearce & Co's cotton office on Front street.

The first the clerks in the cotton-room knew of the circus act was when Douglass cantered into the apartment, very drunk, and gave them the time of day. They did not respond, but got out as quickly as possible, as Douglass had a pistol and they knew him to be bad even when not under the influence of liquor. Then Mr. Pearce and City Commissioner Martin Kelly went up and interviewed Douglass, who was riding around in the cotton-room and trying to make his steed mount the sample tables.

They persuaded him to dismount for the purpose of descending with them and taking a drink, and Mr. Pearce called his negro and told him to lead the horse downstairs.

"D—n you," said the owner of the horse to the negro, "if you touch my horse I'll kill you. I have already killed four men and you're a fine subject for the fifth."

The porter declined to undertake the contract and finally Mr. Pearce himself led the animal down without mishap, Commissioner Kelly hanging on to the tail to steady the procession. As soon as Douglass reached the street he was arrested by a policeman and later was lodged in the jail for carrying a pistol, says the St. Louis Republic.

To make the fact more astonishing, the horse he rode is rather wild than otherwsie. Douglass is as handy with his gun as he claims to be. Several years since he killed Oscar Wooldridge the man who killed Frank Waite, a prominent coal dealer and Republican, in this city fifteen years ago.

LIVED ON HIS OWN FLESH.

A Fever-Stricken Maori Goes Through a Shocking Experience.

A correspondent in the native district of Waipu draws a frightful picture of the condition of the Maories. Fever is prevalen and it is very saddening to see how the Maories neglect to use the most ordinary precautions for isolation. They will persist in sitting in a stifling atmosphere in the presence of both dead and dying.

In many settlements the population seems to have become fatalists, and are resorting to old superstitions and using incantations and a ridiculous travesty of spirit-rapping. These influences are most depressing, and no comfort or consolation is offered the sick people, who are sadly neglected, preparations for the death feast often taking place before the eyes of the dying persons, says the New Zealand Evening Post.

Harewera, an old man ill with a fever, was allowed to wander and fell [illegible] time, and ate earth worms to satisfy his hunger. He also actually bit a piece out of his own arm and sucked his blood. He then crawled into his own place, fell into the fire, and soon died.

Nuta, a schoolboy, recovering from the fever, was allowed to wander into the swamp, and died in two days from relapse, and was buried without a medical certificate.

CURE FOR SLEEPLESSNESS.

Victims of Insomnia Can Hypnotize Themselves Into Slumber.

I have a way of putting myself to sleep that has never failed. But, of course, you wont pay any attention to it because it's so simple. However, here it is:

I close my eyes lightly, and then gently and gradually direct them upward, as if I wanted to look into the the interior of my own skull. The movement must be gentle and gradual or the sudden strain on the nerves will give you a headache, and sometimes there may be some slight discomfort on the first two or three trials, but it wears off rapidly.

After you have retained your eyes in that position for a few moments you feel yourself losing consciousness of time and place and slowly slipping, with delightful smoothness and a kind of dreamy softness, out of the present. I invariably have the one sensation, that of floating in a boat on gently rocking billows that are moving easily away, says a writer in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The process is really a kind of self-hypnotism, and while you are performing it your mind is unable to take up any thread of thought or memory or present to itself any picture other than the one the process itself supplies. It is a very singular thing, and I find that nearly all my acquaintances can repeat after me the self-hypnotic movement.

What a Singer Can Eat.

As to diet, the girl who wants to be a singer should avoid sweets of all kinds. There is nothing better than food of the plainest kind, writes Marie Roze in an article on "How to Preserve the Voice," in the December 'Ladies' Home Journal.' Pastry, nuts, almonds, raisins, pickles, rich sauces are simply poison to a singer, above all people, should partake of only that class of food which digests easily. Never eat closer than two hours before you sing. I go further: if I sing at eight o'clock, I eat at four in the afternoon.

As regards fluids, all are harmful if taken in immoderate quantities. Milk is good, but it is best mixed with soda-water or seltzer. Wines of any kind are injurious, and I cannot be too emphatic in warning all girls who aspire to be singers to abstain from them. I have known some of the most promising voices to be utterly ruined by even the smallest indulgence in wine. Fresh and ripe fruit always makes a good diet for a singer, especially grapes.

The voice is regulated by the health of its possessor, and just as she takes care of that or neglects it she will make a success or failure. A good voice cannot come from an unhealthy constitution. If ever two things were inseparable, they are good health and a good voice. With the former, the latter is possible; without it, vocal excellence is impossible.

COPYRIGHT 1891

Every one suffers from Catarrh in the Head. Those who don't have it suffer from those who do. It's a disease you can't keep to yourself.

Here are some of the symptoms: Headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid; at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid, and offensive; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness; offensive breath; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. But only a few of these likely to be present at once.

The cure for it—for Catarrh itself, and all the troubles that come from it—a perfect and permanent cure, is Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. The worst cases yield to its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties. A record of 25 years has proved that to its proprietors —and they're willing to prove it to you.

They do it in this way: If they can't cure your Catarrh, no matter how bad your case, or of how long standing, they'll pay you $500 in cash. Can you have better proof of the healing power of a medicine?

A REMINISCENCE.

How a Prohibited Article of Diet Was Admitted to the Table.

An Atlantic Monthly of twenty years ago gives an experience belonging to a time when enthusiastic dreamers made wild experiments of "living near nature," and tried to gain sweetness and serenity through earning their own bread by manual labor.

In one such community, each person did a certain amount of house or farm work, and all confined themselves rigidly to vegetable food.

One of the number, however, a somewhat irreverent and skeptical lad, not approving of the prohibition of salt, kept a small box of it on his knee during meal times and slyly dipped his vegetables therein.

His next neighbor discovered the secret and quietly shared the concealed treasure until a certain day, when by some luckless chance the box fell to the floor.

"We hoped," he says, "that the incident might pass unnoticed, but Abel, the most rampant of our philosophers, stretched his long neck across the corner of the table and caught a glimpse of what was going on.

"What's that?" he asked.

"Oh, it's only—only chloride of sodium,' gasped I, recklessly, giving the chemical name of common salt.

"Chloride of sodium? What do you do with it?"

"'Eat it with onions,' I answered boldly. 'It's a chemical substance, but I believe it's found in some plants.'

"Here one member of the party, who knew some thing about chemistry, grew red with suppressed laughter, but the others were as ignorant as Abel himself.

"'Let me taste it,' said he.

"I handed him the box-lid, which still contained a portion of the contents. He dipped an onion in it, bit off a piece, and chewed it gravely.

"'Why,' said he, turning to me, "it's very much like salt!'

"Perkins, the boy, burst into a spluttering yell, and the others, catching the joke, hilariously joined him.

"But while we were laughing Abel finished his onion, and the result was that salt was added to the 'True Food,' and thereafter appeared regularly on the table."

Stonewall Jackson's Religious Views.

So strict was Stonewall Jackson in his religious observances that he never traveled on Sunday, and never posted a letter or took one from mail on that day. He believed, indeed, that it was wrong for the government to carry mails on the Lord's Day. A sketch of the confederate leader in his widow's new memorial of his life shows him to have been a tall, erect and muscular man, with large blue-gray eyes, a Roman nose and ruddy sunburnt cheeks. In refuting the charge that her husband was an awkward horseman, Mrs. Jackson says that it is sufficient to record the fact that he was never thrown from his mount, while his judgement of horses was excellent. In battle he rode with uncovered head along his column, acknowledging the shouts of his devoted men.

Quick-Witted Engineer.

Among Mr. Grundy's "Pictures of the Past" is one of a small, irascible captain of the royal navy, who for some inexplicable reason had been made the manager of the Manchester and Leeds Railway, then newly opened for a few miles from Manchester.

This violent little naval officer issued a pamphlet of instructions to the men, a portion of which was devoted to engine-drivers. Thrilling stories of the result of want of caution abounded.

In those early days, wherever the character of the country favored it, the rails were laid, not upon wooden sleepers, as was soon found more desireable, but upon square, bedded blocks of stone.

The captain's story went that some careless workmen had left one of these blocks of stone in dangerous proximity to the line of rails. Now mark the advantage of the cautious engineer.

He saw the great block, and knew the danger, so "he put his engine as much as possible on the other rail, and just missed the stone, otherwise he must have hit it!"

HIGH OLD CARNIAL

A Supposed Nihilistic Headquarters in St. Petersburg Found to Be a Place of Debauchery for Nobility.

Ladies Often Seen at the Czar's Court Admitted to the Place Disguised in Male Attire.

BERLIN, Jan. 19.—Berlin society is discussing a St. Petersburg scandal, to which no one dares to refer openly. Most of the fifty or more principals are Russians, but but a few of them are aristocratic Germans.

The St. Petersburg police recently informed the czar that many men in his councils and in Russian official life attended frequent Nihilistic meetings at a mansion in a fashionable street. The visitors arrived between 9 and 11 p. m. and straggled away at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. The police watched the house four weeks before they received orders to raid it. A force of 200 police was called out to make it certain that not a single participant escaped. The police were supported by four companies of soldiers within call and were directed by Gen. Gresser and a small body of detectives. The house was surrounded last Monday night by this little body at midnight, when the usual number of visitors had been seen to enter. Gen. Gresser, who had carried the password, gained admittance to the closed vestibule.

A SCENE OF REVELRY.

The inner door was smashed with an ax, and with drawn revolvers the detectives and policemen burst through. They were astounded to find themselves, instead of in a revolutionary meeting, at the open entrance of a brilliant ball room, filled with music and flowers and gay with national colors. Some forty men and women in light, flowing Grecian costumes were dancing. At small tables in the corner half-intoxicated couples drank champagne, and in small private rooms at the back several more couples were found dining and drinking freely. To the mutual surprise and dismay of Gen. Gresser and his officers the fifty or sixty persons participating in the orgies were found to be men and women in the highest St. Petersburg society. Several of the women were known to be received with favor at court, and among the men were Russian officers of high rank and representatives of foreign legations in the capital.

To relieve the mutual embarrassment temporarily, Gen. Gresser took the names and official titles of all. No prisoner was taken to jail, All, however, received the next day paternal admonitions and cuffs from the Czar Alexander.

LADIES IN MALE ATTIRE.

The police had been deceived as to the nature of the gatherings there by the fact that every attendant entered in male attire, for a rule of the society was that, for the sake of safety, the women must come in coats and trousers. Each carnival was devoted to the initiation of the dress and customs of a particular nation. On the night of the raid everything was Grecian. The czar, however, was in a rage when he heard details of the corruption prevalent among the noblemen in his army. The result of his examination of the names submitted by Gen. Gresser was that many Russian officers and officials were transferred. Two married women who participated in the Grecian night have been excluded from court, and another left the city before she was asked to go.

A list of the Germans involved in the scandal was sent by the czar to Emperor William and the hope was expressed in the czar's accompanying letter that the offenders would be punished severely.

Sharp Repartee in the Senate-House.

"Cassius," said Cæsar, "you are all the time criticising the administration; but I notice you have no policy to substitute in place of mine."

"It would be a big day for Rome, nevertheless," retorted Cassius, "if you take my advice."

"Which is briefly what?" asked Cæsar.

"Jump off the Tarpeian rock," replied the conspirator.

"I would if I were as light as you," said the Consul, with quiet dignity, as the lictors requested Cassius to move on.

"By a cat?"

"A kind of cat. But oh, doctor, can you cure me?"

"Not a wolf, but much worse. It was my mother-in-law!"

"In that case," said Gibier, turning to his work, "nothing can be done."

CUTE CHILIANS.

They Have Agents at Work Making Maps of Pacific Coast Harbors.

TACOMA, Wash., Jan. 19.—Secret agents of Chili are said to be in every Pacific coast port making accurate maps of the coast and harbor defenses, their vulnerable points, approaches, etc. Trusted emissaries are said to have been in Tacoma ever since New Year's day, and are said to have obtained accurate information.

The first discovery of these secret agents of the Chilian government was made Jan. 1. Col. G. Douglass Brewerton, formerly of the United States army, now a resident of Tacoma, and who spent two years in South America and is well acquainted with Chilian military officers, claims to have made these discoveries. He recognized in an idler who was watching the passing of the Portland and Tacoma Foot ball clubs, a Chilian officer whom he had known during his residence in that country. Accosting him the two began a conversation, and finally the colonel recalled himself to the other's memory. The Chilian represented that he was here as the agent of a Chilian mining syndicate to make arrangements with the Tacoma smelter or the reduction of ores. Col. Brewerton up to this time had had no suspicions of the Chilian. He knows now why the other was lying.

He set about to watch him and found that he had lodgings in the city, where he met his fellow-countrymen, and that they made frequent trips along the sound, and communicated by mail with persons bearing Chilian names in San Francisco and Portland. This led him to believe that the real purpose of the presence of these Chilians was not one of peaceful commerce, but of reconnoitre for the assistance of the enemy. He questioned the smelter people concerning the supposed mission of the Chilian, and found that the Chilian had never attempted to open negotiations with them for the reduction of Chilian ores.

LOOKS WARLIKE.

The Formidable Monitor Montauk Being Prepared for Service.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 19.—After years of comparative idleness the League Island navy yard began to show signs of life and industry to-day.

In pursuance of orders from Washington the formidable monitor Montauk will be prepared at once for service. A force of men was put to work this morning sufficiently to equip the vessel for sea in three weeks, though Capt. Coghlan, acting commandant at League island, remarked that if urgent necessity required it the Montauk could be equipped in a week. Capt. Coghlan added that two other monitors at League island, the Nahant and Jason, could also be gotten ready for service in a week.

Though the orders from the navy department were brief and unexplained, the officers at the yard naturally construe them as bearing on the Chilian trouble.

A STRONG TEAM.

Such Are the Minnesota Senators Acknowledged to Be.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 19. —Charles A. Pillsbury, E. V. Smalley and other Minnesota men were to-day discussing the standing of the Minnesota senators in Washington and the general conclusion was that Minnesota has as strong a team as any other state in the Union.

Mr. Pillsbury was of the opinion that the hard work which Senator Davis was doing, his ability on the floor and his knowledge of public questions were such as to give Minnesota a prestige that was not only a credit to her, but accomplished a great deal of good in the way of legislation.

Mr. Smalley said that Senator Washburn was a hard worker and got around with a great deal of force and had a way of getting things through the senate and the departments that made him a valuable senator to the state. The consensus of opinion was that Minnesota had a good team, and that it would be bad policy to make any changes at the present time.

The President Will Not Appoint a Democrat to the Eighth Circuit.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 19. —It has been reported that Senator Davis had intimated that if a Democrat was to be appointed judge of the Eighth circuit he preferred Judge Nelson to Judge Mitchell. This can be authoritatively denied, as the senator has no second choice, but is for Sanborn until the matter is ended.

The pressure which has been brought to bear upon the president to refrain from appointing a Democrat in the Eighth circuit is said to have had the desired effect, and that he now has made up his mind to appoint a Republican. The Minnesota people think that Mr. Sanborn's chances are as favorable as ever, and have not given up in the least the pressure they have brought to bear upon the president to make this appointment. It is understood that several members of the Democratic delegation now in Washington have put in a word for Judge Mitchell's appointment.

Mormons in the State.

RED WING, Minn., Jan. 19.—Some Mormon elders are at work proselyting on the southern edge of this county. Residents there have became incensed at their work and threaten to drive them out of the country.

Vilas' Decision Overruled.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—A decision rendered by Postmaster General Vilas in 1885 that railroads receiving the benefits of land grants from the government receive only 80 per cent of the contract rate for carrying mails for the whole length of their lines, was overruled by the supreme court to-day. The Alabama Southern appealed to the court of claims, claiming that on the thirty-one miles of its road it had not received the land grand aid and the full sum should be paid for carrying mail. The court of claims sustained the railroad, overruling the postmaster general, and the decision of the supreme court to-day sustains this decision.

Wheat is 71 cents.

J. C. Dahl left today for Crookston on business.

It looks today as if we might have a few days of decent weather.

If you want to insure your buildings against fire, call at this office.

Lars Elstad has been suffering from an attack of la grippe the past week.

The North Star Lung and Throat Balsam is sure cure for coughs and colds.

The weather has been so severe the past week that business is almost at a standstill.

Engineer Milliken, of the Great Northern is here this week with a crew of surveyors doing some work.

Elmer Stranahan returned today from Stephen where he has been visiting friends the past week.

The blizzard yesterday was a howling success and is clearly the banner blizzard for this season,

Miss Josey Harris returned last Friday from New London, Minn., where she has been attending school.

It is estimated here by many that not one half of the wheat tributary to this place has been marketed up to date.

We learn that John E. Burkee has accepted a position with H, Langsett. Thief River Falls, and will leave the first of next month to commence work

The price of wheat seems to have struck bottom at last and has advanced a couple of cents this week, No 1 hard now being worth 71 cents in this market.

Morris Tribune: Our new seventh congressional district is 288 miles long in a direct line. From the northern to the southern limits, by railroad, it is over three hundred miles.

C. G. Rapp went down to Crookston last Friday and was taken sick with the grippe, He had quite a severe seige, but returned today much better.

County Commissioners M. E. Kinsch A. C. Rhinehart and C. P. De Mers were in town today on their way to Thief River Falls. They were accompanied by Mr. Jack, representing a bridge building firm, and went up to look over the site for the proposed new county bridge.

The cold wave of the past two weeks has been the most severe this country has experianced for several years. During the time the thermometer registered as low as fifty below and rarely got higher than 20 below, Yesterday's windup with the biggest blizzard of the season was, we hope, the last of the bad streak.

If it is a fact that the Red Lake reservation contains from 13 to 15 billion feet of pine, this country need have no fear of a timber famine for a good many years. This would allow the cutting of 100 million feet annually for over one hundred years, not counting the timber that would grow during that time.

Dan Patterson, that all around good fellow and business man of many callings, from St. Hilaire, is in the city for a few days on business. He made our office a pleasant call and stated that things up in St, Hilaire were booming Dan is a hustler from away back and believes in speaking a good word for his home town whenever and wherever opportunity offers.—Crookston Times

One hundred of St. Paul's prominent Democrats are in Washington this week hustling for the Democratic National Convention. They seem to be making a hard fight with a a fair show of success Milwaukee, Cincinnati, New York and Detroit are prominent competitors and "the other Twin" has considerable hard work to do to secure the prize, The matter will be decided by the National Committee on Thursday or Friday, of this week.

Mr. John Wannamaker, the Philadelphia merchant, says that during the ten days previous to Christmas, his sales cover about $100,000 a day, so that the grand total for the ten days was only a few dollars under a million. He adds: "I spend $5,000 a week in advertising, and I pay a skillful man—a former editor, and a good one—$1,000 a month to do it for me. I make money by it. Advertising is the leverage with which this store has been raised up. I do not see how any large and successful business can be done without liberal advertising."

County Commissioner A, C. Rhinehart who is also one of the appraisers of the Red Lake pine made us a short call to day. He is of the opinion that there is a great deal more pine on the reservation than has been supposed He estimates that there are between 10 and 13 billion feet of exceptionally fine timber there. He also informed us that a part of the pine is certain to be sold next summer and that logging will commence next winter.

The management of the Grand Opera House at Crookston have secured the Andrews Opera Co. for one night only Tuesday Jan, 26th 1892. Let us get up a party and go down and "enjoy life while we live for we'll be a long time dead." It will be one of the finest musical treats ever heard in Crookston.

Crookston Times: From the numerous protests that are pouring in against the national park scheme we learn that the valley of the Rainy River instead of being undesirable for agricultural purposes, as supposed by many, is one of the finest tracts of country for small farming that there is in the state the soil being excellent, the timber supply unlimited and the means of transportation very favorable since boats have been put on the river.

How are you fixed for insurance? Cold weather is coming on and you should protect your property against fire. Call at this office for rates. Remember that we can give you just as low a rate as anyone and give you your choice of several first class companies

H. Ellersick and John Ellersick of Browerville Minn, were here last week looking up a location for a saw mill. They are old hands at the saw mill business and possess plenty of means to carry on the work. They propose to erect a mill here the coming spring with a capacity of fifty thousand feet daily with planer lath and shingle mills. They have made application to the Townsite Co. for a site and the prospects for their locating here are exceedingly good.

Sioux Falls has a formidable rival in the divorce business in the ancient town of Yankton. The latter has taken to publishing its divorce cases in the newspapers just as the larger cities print their bank clearings. It is also announced that a Yankton divorce is just as swift and speedy as the Sioux Falls article; that the cases are just as highly flavored and the colonists just as distinguished. Yankton's claims are entitled to respectful consideration.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Fergus Falls Journal: It is our democratic friends who are not pleased with the recent action of the state alliance. Until the meeting the alliance was patted on the back and Mr. Donnelly was praised as an astute politician, who would readily foresee the advantage of fusion with the Democrats. But since the Alliance has decided to be a strictly independent party and has made it impossible for the Democrats to join with it on account of its platform the St. Paul Globe has begun to jump on it,

A manufactured egg which was bought and sold in St. Paul last week, and was brought before the state dairy and food commisson and subjected to a chemical analysis and in weight, size and color were exactly like a real egg the shell when cracked looked and felt like the genuine article. The shell is made of lime and other gredients, the white portion mostly of gelatine and yolk contains considerable sulphur among other things. Money can be made by selling them at 12 cents a dozen.—Ada Index.

Joseph Hays was not drunk nor insane. He had tried to get work and had failed, He had no money and he was cold and hungry. He purloined a basket and walked boldly into the basement of Fred Bertrand's saloon at 141 Washington street on Sunday night Then he began throwing coal into his basket from a pile in the corner of the room making a big noise. He was overheard, caught in the act of larceny and arrested. "All right" said Joseph Hays with an air of great content, "I will now get something to eat and a place to sleep in the bridewell." This happened in Chicago where there is considerable talk of raising a fund for the purpose of relieving the starving poor of Russia.—Chicago Herald.

Lieut Beadon, recruting officer of the United States army, arrived in this city on Wednesday from White Earth. He was on his way to Red Lake agency where he will endeavor to recruit two companies of fifty-five men each from among the Indians of that reservation If successful the companies will be quartered at Fort Snelling. He was accompanied by Henry and John Beaulieu of White Earth who will assist him in his work, He is confident of success and says that so far the experiment of enlisting Indians into the army has been eminently successful and satisfactory to the army officers, and that the Indians possess many favorable qualities for making good soldiers.—Thirteen Towns

Word comes from the town of Grove Park that a pauper named R. Kraemer had been found there yesterday in a shanty almost frozen to death, It appears that the old man is over 75 years of age and has for several years lived a hermit's life in a shanty in the above town. For several years the county supplied him with food and the necessaries of life, until the law providing that each township should look after its own paupers came into effect. Since that time Kraemer has fared poorly indeed, and it is stated that he could not obtain wood enough to keep him with a constant fire He would take flat stones, place them in the fire during the day and at night pull them from the coals and spread his blanket over them. Upon this "downy" couch he has slept. But it seems that the recent cold weather used up his supply of fuel and Tuesday morning he was found so badly frozen that it is feared his life is endangered. If these are the facts—and they come from reliable sources—the authorities of the town of Grove Park have been derelect in their duty, and the county board should investigate the case. Every town should value the lives of their poor enough to give them the necessary comforts of life—enough at least to keep them from freezing as in the above case.—Crookston Times.

This, from the Dodge County Republican, contains so much good sense, put in such good shape, that we copy it entire, although it is of considerable length: "If people generally could be brought to realize the importance of supporting home industries, some merchants and home tradesmen, the community in which they live would be much benefited, It is a great mistake to go away from your own town to purchase articles that can be obtained at home just to save a few cents Every dollar sent away for goods that can be furnished by home merchants cripples the business just that much, and to that extent is a detriment. The longer a dollar can be kept in circulation at home the more good that dollar will do to the town and the more you benefit the town in which you live, the more your benefit yourself. Almost every small town sends hundreds of dollars yearly to the large cities for goods that can be had at home just as good and nearly as cheap thinking they are deriving immense benefit from the few cents saved seemingly forgetting that the local dealers and tradesmen are entitled to their patronage, What the people of the smaller towns need to make them more prosperous and happy is a disposition to aid each other in all ligitimate ways cultivating dispositions of friendship rather than jealousy and suspicion, There should be less fault finding less back-biting and less contumely than is generally exhibited. If all will make up their minds to spend their dollars and dimes at home thereby enriching each other to the extent of the profit on articles bought and sold, it will be money well invested, and will return ten fold in the future and be the means of building up their town. Every penny spent at home is a benefit to somebody, while every penny spent at home is a benefit to somebody while every penny spent away is a damage to the community, One fact is undoubtedly overlooked by people who send away for goods and that is, the more business you give your home merchant the better he is enabled to give you low prices; and the same is true of tradesmen and mechanics."

That New Salt Lake.

Howard J. Cone, who for the past year has been the agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad company at Salton, is at home in South Pasadena on a leave of absence for a few weeks. A reporter enjoyed a talk with him about the Salton sea, or lake, that has caused so much interest throughout the country.

Mr. Cone says a temperature of 118 and 120 degs. in the shade is quite a regular and common thing at Salton, but that the few white people about the station and salt works manage to stand it pretty well. They prespire profusely and drink enormously, all the water used at the station being brought from up the road by rail. They find that mixing oatmeal with the water is nourishing and that it prevents illness. Despite the great heat, sectionmen work out in the hot sun regularly, but, with the exception of the boss, they are Mexicans.

Mr. Cone brought up some excellent photographs of the lake, the station and the submerged salt works, from different points of view. He says the inflow and the evaporation of the water about counterbalance each other, and that therefore the level of the lake remains about the same, although the wind sometimes carries floating debris back and forth in a way to lead to the belief that the water is rising or falling. He believes it likely that the basin will continue to fill up from the Colorado river to a level with the gulf, and that it will be a permanent body of water, with the Colorado flowing through it to the gulf.

The salt deposits are entirely under water, and that industry is ruined. The warehouse and a small portion of the Southern Pacific's track running beyond the salt beds are still above the level of the lake, but the main track is still 1,000 feet or more from its banks.—Pasadena (Cal.) Star.

The Waif of Wounded Knee.

On the through train which arrived over the Rock Island route was a party of editors from Des Moines, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, Beatrice and Fairbury. They breakfasted at the Albany and were entertained by the governor and mayor.

In the party was a fifteen-months-old Indian baby, which was found upon the battlefield of Wounded Knee after the defeat of the Sioux by United States troops. It has been adopted by Mrs. Colby and was christened Zintke Lanuni, which means in the Sioux tongue the waif of the field of Wounded Knee. It was on the fourth day after the battle that the child was found beside its dead mother. Its feet and one side of its face were frozen.

It was given in care of an Indian woman to nurse and soon showed no trace of its exposure and suffering. Mrs Colby obtained permission to adopt the child, but she was hidden by the Indians and it was only by dint of bribery that its whereabouts was discovered. The Indians were given orders on the post trader, and while they were making purchases she was smuggled out of camp and driven to the nearest railway station, and thence taken to Beatrice, Neb.

Mrs. Colby has legally adopted the child, and proposes to educate her and train her to a useful life.—Denver Republican.

Saving Rent in the City.

"To Let" signs on flats and houses all over the city are coming down with the returning rush from mountain and seashore. The number of returning families who are hiring new dwelling places calls attention to a way of saving summer rents which is increasing in popularity each year as the summer vacations lengthen. Families which expect to be out of the city from two to three months now surrender their leases on May 1, put their furniture in storage, go to a boarding house for the four or six weeks before the country pilgrimage begins, then return in September or October and hire a new dwelling place. In this way they save at least four, and in some cases five months' rent, $125 to $200 toward their summer outing.

Real estate men will tell you that it is almost impossible to rent flats or houses in the summer at any price. I know one man who gave up an attractive flat on May 1 for an outing in the mountains, who will find the same home swept and garnished for him at the landlord's expense on his return in October.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Globular Lightning.

A curious thunderbolt fell at Berga, near Schlieben, in Germany, recently. It appeared to be a ball of fire and came down the chimney of a bedroom in which a man, his wife and three children were sleeping. On emerging from the fireplace it broke into two parts, each of which assumed a globular form. One of these globes ran along the rafters and disappeared, while the other traveled slowly toward the bed, on which it afterward jumped. Thence the man watched it roam around the room and finally disappear through the wall with a loud crash. None of the occupants was injured, further than being temporarily deafened.—New York Recorder.

It Fixes Mosquitoes.

To clear the room of mosquitoes take a piece of paper rolled around a lead pencil to form a case, and fill this with very dry Persian insect powder, putting in a little at a time, and pressing it down with a pencil. Set this cigarette in a cup of sand to hold it erect. An hour before going to bed close the room and set the cigarette on fire. One will be sufficient for a small room, but for a large room two will be required.—Detroit Free Press.

Impervious to Cold.

A professor of the Paris Academy de Sciences has been making experiments, which have resulted in convincing him that the rabbit is, of all living things, the most capable of withstanding a very low temperature. Inclosed all night in a block of ice, a rabbit was found next day getting on very comfortably and evidently not aware of anything very peculiar in his circumstances.—New York Journal.

The Bradlaugh Library.

Mr. Bradlaugh's daughter has published the priced catalogue of her late father's library, in the form of a substantial pamphlet. With a view to make it not merely a descriptive list of books but a memento of their original possessor, two photographic portraits are added, together with a fac simile signature. The books number in all 7,000 volumes, exclusive of pamphlets and blue books. They comprise, as his daughter says, only a few rare bindings and comparatively few costly first editions, but such as they were he valued them.

"Twice," she adds, "within recent years he thought he should be obliged to sell them to meet legal expenses. The first time it was to pay government costs during his parliamentary struggle; the second occasion was after the Peters and Kelly case. Each time the sale was happily averted, but the anticipation of the possibility brought extra lines to his face and bitterness to his heart. Last December, when he was feeling ill and in want of a rest and change, which he had no money to procure, I asked him 'Why not sell two or three of the more valuable books? If you could get health with the money they would fetch, it would be well worth the exchange.'

"'Ah! my daughter,' he answered with a sad half smile, 'when I have to part with my books'— I was anxious about him and ventured to press him further, but he only shook his head, saying, 'It is of no use arguing the matter.'"—London News.

Bad Boys and a Turtle.

The boys have been keeping the fire department busy of late. Some boys caught a turtle and poured oil over it near the city's house for storing naphtha on Dwight street, then set the shell on fire. The turtle ran up to the door of the house, and in an instant the whole interior was in flames. An alarm was sounded, and the department worked over two hours before the flames were subdued.—Holyoke (Mass.) Cor. Springfield Republican.

The Lord Told Her to Sing.

The Baptist chapel at Leytonstone was crowded on Sunday because of an announcement that Madam Antoinette Sterling would sing during the service. She not only sang, but at the prayer meeting which followed joined in prayer and delivered a short address. It may not be generally known that the famous contralto is a believer in the doctrine of the Inward Light.

A pretty story is told about her in this connection. She was present at one of the Quaker meetings at Devonshire square, and the brethren and sisters remained some long time without the spirit moving any of them to utterance. At last Madam Sterling got up and sang "O Rest in the Lord," which created no small stir. The clerk afterward approached her, and said, "Thee knowest, sister, it's against the rules; but if the Lord telleth thee to sing, thee must!"

It was probably through her recollection of this incident that Mrs. Margaret Lacy, the sister of that old tribune of the people, John Bright, called in her last illness for "the singing sister." Needless to say, Madam Sterling went.—British Weekly.

An Organ Grinder's Sparring Combination

An organ grinder who has been in this city for a month has a scheme which is making him a small fortune.

Instead of the customary one monkey this industrious son of Italy carries two. When he stops the ordinary tricks of climbing and begging are dispensed with, the monkeys are set to fighting and bets are made by the owner with any of the spectators who are so inclined as to which monkey will win.

The owner's bets are freely taken, and they rarely go against him. The result is that where, under the old method, he would probably receive a few nickels he now receives dollars.

A reporter watched the man with the monkeys for nearly an hour in front of the new city hall, where he was surrounded by a large crowd, who were freely contributing their quarters, halfs and dollars to the coffers of the musician.—San Francisco Chronicle.

May Yet Have a Monument.

Interest has recently been revived in the proposed Garfield monument, a fund for which was started in the fall of 1881 shortly after President Garfield's death. The fund was limited to dollar subscriptions, and 604 persons subscribed. Then the affair collapsed, as far as public interest was concerned, and Dec. 11, 1883, H. B. Duncan, treasurer of the fund, placed the $604 on deposit in the Wilmington Savings fund. The interest increments since that time have increased the principal to the sum of $837.05. There is talk now of making an effort to increase the fund to a limit sufficient to admit of the erection of a suitable statue of the dead president in one of the city's public parks.—Wilmington Every Evening.

What One Cow Did.

That a cow has a wonderful appetite when she gets into a neighbor's field was clearly shown in Indiana, where the injured owner proved in court that one ordinary brindle cow destroyed in one afternoon the following property: Two 4-year-old cherry trees, 7 apple trees, 5 pear trees, 1 plum tree, 100 heads of cabbage, 12 rows of beans 5 rods long, 1 row of beets 1¼ rods long, 50 to 150 sweet potato plants, 1 bed of onions, 8 grapevines and 14 blackberry bushes.—Boston News.

Lightning In and Near a Church.

Two hundred persons were assembled at divine service in the Mower Hightower church, near Osborn, Ga., when a bolt of lightning entered the edifice. Some of the people were rendered senseless, others had their clothing torn from their bodies, several were burned and every one bore more or less serious marks of the lightning. Although no person was fatally injured, a horse that stood outside the church was instantly killed by the electric fluid.—Yankee Blade.

Novel Matches.

A new method of obtaining a light has just been patented in England. Instead of the old fashioned safety match, the stick is tipped at both ends, one end with the usual composition and the other with that found on the scratcher outside the box. Light is obtained by breaking the match in the middle and rubbing the two ends together.—Exchange.

Nine persons of royal blood—one emperor, three kings, one queen, two heirs apparent, one emperor's brother and the wife of one heir presumptive (the Countess of Flanders)—slept on French soil on a recent night.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

"La! well, it was very honest in you to tell me so, else I should ha' been taken in," said the old lady, rising to depart.

"I can show you some genuine Welsh flannel, really all wool, and warrant not to shrink much, at a higher price, mum," said the young man, trying to stop her progress.

"No, I thank you; I think I'll go over the way," replied the old lady, evidently afraid of being "taken in."

The face of Mr. Black, who had overheard this conversation was crimson with anger. Hastening after the departing customer he exclaimed—

"It was all a mistake, mum, about those flannels; the tickets were put upon the wrong goods, I assure you. I ordered my young men to rectify the error immediately, but I suppose they neglected it; it shall, however be done instantly. In the meantime, if you will step back we can show you—

"Oh, no, I thank you," hastily exclaimed the old lady, hurrying out of the shop.

"There! now you've done it again," muttered Mr. Black, in a low, enraged voice close to the ear of Joseph. Have you taken leave of your senses this morning. Why should you tell that lady that the flannel wasn't Welsh, wasn't wool, and would shrink badly.

"Because she asked me, and I had to answer her the truth.

"Truth!" exclaimed the proprietor, in a voice of suppressed fury. But at this moment a party of ladies advanced toward Joseph, and his principal retreated to recover his composure.

"Now, are these real French silks?" inquired one of the ladies, examining what was intended to pass muster for glace.

"N—n—no, madam," faltered Joseph, blushing up to his eyes.

"But they are labeled 'Genuine French Silks,' though I had my doubt about it, too; but why do you label them thus, if they are not so? But it is a mistake, I suppose?" said the lady, interrogatively.

"No, madam, it was not."

"What! you don't mean to say that it was done on purpose?"

"Yes, madam."

"Why do you put false labels on your goods?"

"To sell them at a better price."

"But that is cheating!" cried the lady, in a shocked voice.

"I know it, madam," the truth-teller was forced to admit. "But we call it shaving."

"And is this the practice of your shop?"

"Yes, madam."

"Shocking! And—but why do you expose these things? Have you quarreled with your employers?"

"No madam; I never was in higher account with them than this morning."

"Extraordinary! But why, then, do you dare tell me these things?"

"Because you ask me questions which I feel compelled to answer truthfully."

"Wonderful! And do you always tell the truth?"

"I do now, madam."

"And do your employers know of it?"

"I think not."

"I should think not, indeed!"

"But how about these silks falsely labelled French. I should like to know what they really are?"

"English silks of rather inferior quality."

"But what is their real worth in retail?"

"About two shillings a yard."

"And you sell them for three shillings! a third more than their value! Monstrous! I never will enter this shop, and I shall certainly let every one of my friends know how they are taken in," said the lady, dropping the silks and departing.

This scene was witnessed not only by the panic-stricken Black, but by White and Green, who stood in consternation for a minute after the lady had left the shop; and then all three made a simultaneous rush upon Joseph, exclaiming in a breath—

"What on earth do you mean, sir?"

"Are you mad? Do you wish to ruin us?" demanded Black.

"You are driving away every customer out of the shop. You are costing us a hundred pounds an hour, if a penny exclaimed Green.

"Why do you act in this insane manner?" inquired White.

"I am asked questions, and I tell the truth," answered Joseph, driven to desperation by this storm of invective.

"Truth! What do you mean by that? you say our labels are false!" said Black.

"You say we put false tickets on our goods, to sell them at a better price!" said Green.

"And that it is the practice of our establishment!" said White.

"Well, it is the truth! the truth! the truth! and I must speak the truth, if I die for it!" cried Joseph, wildly.

"Get out of our shop, you villian!" roared Black.

"Begone; you scoundrel!" thundered Green.

"Never show your face inside of our doors again, you reprobate!" shouted White.

"Go!" stormed all three.

The time had come. Joseph took his hat, leaped lightly over the counter, and stopping only to snatch the parcel consigned to his care by Brown, vanished from the shop.

"Well," thought Joseph Morriss, as he found himself in the street, with the parcel under his arm "I have spoken the truth for six hours only, without any other fault than that, I find myself disinherited and turned out of doors by my uncle, and disgraced and driven from the shop of my employers! Will the rest follow? Will sweet Lizzie Bell discard me for telling her some unpleasant truth! And will terrified and indignant society send me to Bedlam as a madman too dangerous to be at large?"

CHAPTER IV.

"It' gude to be merry and wise,
It's gude to be honest and true,
It's gude to be off wi' the auld love
Before ye be on wi' the new."

"I had better made a compact with my conscience—so much temporal prosperity for so much violation of principle—than this agreement with Blewitt to speak the truth for a week! Now, where shall I bend my steps? Turned out of my uncle's house, and driven from my employer's shop, what shall I do? The sooner I finish it all up and get into Bedlam the better. There, at least, I shall have board, lodging, and attendance. There I shall not be kicked out for telling the truth; quite the contrary, for the more truth I speak, the longer they will keep me, for the madder they will think me. Bedlam for my money!—and Bedlam for ever! But in the meantime, what am I to do?" thought Joseph Morriss, as he stood looking up and down the street.

"Give a poor man a penny, sir," suggested a miserable looking tramp at his elbow.

"No; don't see it; I'm a poor man myself," said Joseph.

"Out of work, sir."

"Serves you right; so am I."

"It was not my fault, sir."

"I'm another; twasn't mine."

"Wife and fifteen small children, sir; mostly twins, 'specially the three last, sir."

"Then you possess more than I do, so how dare you beg from me? Be off with yourself."

"Please, sir all down with the measles."

"Then I shouldn't like to catch it; get away," said Joseph, who having refused the beggar a penny, tossed him a crown, and then made the best of his own way to the Angel and Gridiron, to find "his warmest welcome at an inn." He engaged a room, where he deposited his parcel to remain until the evening, and went to call upon his betrothed.

Lizzy Bell was the niece of a thriving milliner in the next street, and the heiress peesumptive of the shop, the business, and the savings. She was a little fair-skinned, rosy-cheeked, blue-eyed, yellow-haired lump of a girl, always dressed out as an advertesment to the shop. Her business was to sit in the show-rooms, exhibit fashions, and wheedle customers until her aunt should be at leisure to receive orders. She had a fair knowledge of trade, and a sharp eye to the main chance. Otherwise, her intellect was shallow, and her education superficial.

She had been engaged for about a year to Joseph Morriss, who, as head clerk of Black, Brown, Green, and White, and heir of old John Morriss; was considered quite a catch by girls of her class. So Miss Lizzy Bell had angled for him, and caught him; and Mr. Joseph Morriss, being good-natured and obliging, had easily suffered himself to be taken. The scene of the said man-fishing had been the shop of Messrs. B., B., G. and W., where Miss Lizzy was in the habit of going to purchase goods. And now they were bethrothed, and the marriage was fixed to come off on the first of the ensuing month.

Joseph was so very fond of her that he quite mistook her personal appearence for her very self, and supposed her soft, round, white form, and blue eyes, to indicate an affectionate disposition, her dulness to be good temper, and her lumpish immobility to prove constancy and domesticity. He had not even begun to suspect that all this in her meant simply indolence, selfihness, and self-indulgence. He was now on his way to confide to her "tender and faithful bosom" his own great troubles.

She received him as usual in the little front drawing-room over the shop, and adjoining the show-room, where she daily sat among lace curtains, and other gossamer draperies, like a pretty little spider in an elegant little web, to exhibit enticing fineries and entangle feminine flies.

She was dressed, in a redundancy of pink flounces, that made her resemble a large cabbage-rose in full bloom. She was seated near the center table, and engaged in copying a Parisian pattern bonnet that hung upon a little pole before her.

There was no one else in the room when Joseph entered.

"So you have come at last," she said, without rising to receive him.

"Yes," he replied, wearily sinking into a chair.

"I hope you had a pleasant visit with your friend, Miss Robinson, last evening."

"I was at the chapel," replied Joseph, looking up, in surprise. "I was anxious to hear Mr. Sturm——"

"Oh, yes; and to wait on Miss Robinson. I believe it is principally shop-boys and servant-girls that go to hear that ranter."

"I do not clearly understand you, Lizzy. Mr. Sturm is no ranter, and his hearers are composed of all classes, from the nobility and gentry down to the news-boys and street-sweepers."

"To say nothing of Miss Robinson."

"Why do you reiterate a waiting-woman's name to me in this manner, Lizzy? You seem to be angry with me without a cause. What is the matter?"

"Ah, I know of your carryings on; you don't think I do! I hear of you!"

"Lizzy, you meet me with undeserved reproaches this morning, when I am in peculiar need of comfort——"

"Oh! I suppose you are! I suppose you have offended Miss Robinson, have you not?"

"Yes."

"There, I knew it! Well, you needn't come to me for comfort; you had better go and make it up with your lady's ing woman."

"Lizzy, you insult me!" exclaimed the young man, in such an angry tone, and with such a crimson brow, that the flippant girl became alarmed. She had not credited one word of the story hinted to her by Jane Robinson, though she had acted upon it to gratify her love of giving pain. So now, holding out her hand to him, she said—

"Well, if you haven't been paying attention to a lady's-maid, I had a good right to think you had. The woman was in here this morning in a towering passion, and said you had been making love to her!"

"Said that I had been——"

"Well, if she didn't say it, she hinted it."

"What did she say?"

Lizzy told him.

"And now I will relate what really did pass," said Joseph, and thereupon he described the scene between himself and Robinson.

Lizzy laughed heartily. She was malicous enough keenly to enjoy the discomfiture of the abigail. When her fit of laughter was over, she wiped the tears from her eyes, looked up, and inquired.—

"But what possessed you to tell her that?"

"Because she asked me, and I had to answer truly."

"But gracious me, the truth is not to be told at all times. 'Isn't prudent. Now, you've made a mortal enemy of Miss Lyle's confidential attendant, and, she'll go and persuade her mistress not to deal at your shop—or mine either, perhaps."

"I think it quite likely, indeed, Lizzy. And that is not the only scrape I have got into this morning either," sighed the young man.

"That is quite enough; but what else?"

Joseph related the breakfast scene between himself and his relatives that ended in his expulsion from their house.

"And so, dear Lizzy," he concluded, "because, in answer to observations that were made to me, I admitted that I should not be quite inconsolable if my aunt and uncle were to die, and that the legacy I expected from him would help to comfort me for their loss he has turned me out of doors, and disinherited me!"

Lizzie did not laugh now! She was quite sensible of the pecuniary damage she herself, as Joseph's wife, might sustain in the loss of that inheritance. Her face flushed deeply with displeasure at this; but she took up the tone of righteous anger, as she answered,—

"And served you right, too! for indeed I must say it was very undutiful, and cruel, and unnatural in you, to say such things to your uncle and aunt—and such a rich uncle, too! and you his only nephew! I don't know what could have possessed you. Why did you say them?"

"Because I was asked questions, and had to answer them truly, as I told you before."

"And as I told you before, the truth is not to be spoken at all times; and in this case it was downright wicked to speak the truth—to such a wealthy relative, too! Why, when my aunt says to me—'La! Lizzy, my dear, whatever would you do if you were to lose me? I don't answer her, 'A great deal better without you, aunt; for then I should have everything all to myself,' although that would be the truth, because, if I did, she would turn me out of doors, and serve me right! No; I answer—'La, aunt! don't talk so; you break my heart. If you were to die, I should cry my eyes out, and pine myself into the grave in a month.'"

"And does she believe you?"

"She believes that at least I think so, and that I am sincere in what I say; and so she loves me all the better, and saves all the more for me."

"Lizzy, you revolt me! I could not have believed that there was so much insensibility and insincerity in your nature," said the young man, in a mournful voice.

"It is not insincerity—it is prudence, and good nature, and dutifulness to parents—I mean to aunts. And bad as I am, Mr. Virtuous Indignation, I'm not so bad as to hurt the feelings of them that brought me up, and cared for me, as somebody else did," sneered Lizzy.

"I had best tell you the extent of the mischief at once, Lizzy, for the rupture with my uncle is not the only misfortune that has overtaken me this day," said the young man desperately.

"Well, what is the other? I am ready to hear anything now."

Joseph related to her the events of the morning at his place of business. He ended by saying—

Bricks Without Straw.

The editor of a Texas daily paper, who, by the way, did not understand the business, engaged the services of Pete Bingham as local editor. He was to receive the princely stipend of eleven dollars a week. The first week, as luck would have it, was a dull one. The editor-in-chief was somewhat discouraged, and disposed to regard Pete as a failure. He said:

"Mr. Bingham, there is very little local news in the paper."

"Yes, the past week has been very dull," replied Pete.

"It seems to me, Mr. Bingham, that for the wages we pay you, a great deal ought to happen in Houston."

Sharp Repartee in the Senate-House.

"Cassius," said Cæsar, "you are all the time criticising the administration; but I notice you have no policy to substitute in place of mine."

"It would be a big day for Rome, nevertheless," retorted Cassius, "if you take my advice."

"Which is briefly what?" asked Cæsar.

"Jump off the Tarpeian rock," replied the conspirator.

"I would if I were as light as you," said the Consul, with quiet dignity, as the lictors requested Cassius to move on.

How to Catch Lightning.

M. Dovaroff, a Moscow scientist, has discovered that when lightning strikes in a forest the white poplar (populus alba) is the first to attract it. He came to the conclusion that the tree can be used as a natural lightning rod, and he submitted a memorial to the Minister of the Interior advocating that the planting of a white poplar before every house in the village be made obligatory upon the peasants to prevent fire by lightning.

The Wrong Man Found.

Citizeness—"Did you go and thrash that editor for printing those things about you?"

Citizen—"I went to the office, but I couldn't find him."

"Whom did you find there?"

"No one, but a great big, bull-necked fellow who pretended he was responsible for that article, but I knew from his looks that he couldn't write."—Street and Smith's Good News.

Perfumed Gloves.

Perfumed gloves are a novelty on sale at some of the shops. They are usually the suede mousquetaire, and they are so treated with orris root that their fragrance is practically imperishable, certainly outlasting the life, even in careful hands, of these frequently renewed necessities.—Housekeepers' Weekly.

A German paper quotes messages from an old book by a Hebrew who strove to relieve the Jews from the responsibility for the crucifixion. The author argued that the executioners of the Messiah were the bodyguard of Pilate, which consisted of Teutons. The book is entitled: "Proof That Those Who Crucified Christ Were Westphalians."

WATER AND A SANDWICH.

And Then Men Wonder Why They Look Old When Really Young.

No living person, man or woman, likes the thought of showing the marks of fleeting years. It is all right to grow old; people do not mind that idea so much as they dislike the appearance of age. You can't keep the years from passing nor the grey hairs from coming, but you can by care in so every-day a matter as eating keep away other external marks of old Father Time. This is not a set of rules, but a very plain statement of a single fact or two.

Step into a down-town lunch room at the noon hour, and observe what they eat and how they eat it—a glass of ice water and a sandwich or two, with a piece of pie, five minutes in which to eat, then away again in the rush of business. Among men of sense this should not be. Eat slowly and eat good, substantial food.

It has been proved by a series of rigorously exact observations that by a succulent, delicate and choice regimen, the external appearances of age are kept away for a long time. It gives more brilliancy to the eye, more freshness to the skin, more support to the muscles; and, as it is certain in physiology that wrinkles, those formidable enemies of beauty, are caused by the depression of the muscle, it is equally true that, other things being equal, those who understand eating are comparatively four years younger than those ignorant of that science. Painters and sculptors are deeply penetrated with this truth, for in representing those who practice abstinence by choice or duty, such as misers or anchorites, they always give them the pallor of disease, the leanness of misery, and the wrinkles of decrepitude.

The subject of cookery has received a large share of attention in all ages, of which memorials have been retained. Dr. Johnson thought the matter of writing a cook book was far above the capacity of the ordinary woman, and Boswell, with his accustomed modesty, says that the doctor seriously entertained the notion of writing one himself.

Ruskin, the greatest art critic of modern times, and who ranks rightly as one of the masters of the English language, in his work called "Preterita," stops in his account of Italian sculptorings and frescoes to note a remembrance of his father's house and kitchen and cook. "I have never," says he, "seen a fillet of veal rightly roasted, nor a Yorkshire pudding rightly basted since Mary Stone left us to be married in 1836."—New York Mail and Express.

DUTCH CLEANLINESS.

In Holland the Kitchen is Kept in as Neat Order as the Parlor.

The Holland cities are the cleanest in the world. The Hague, a city of perhaps 100,000 inhabitants, is so thoroughly clean that everything shines. Not one speck of dirt is allowed to soil a building and every street is so thoroughly washed and swept that one hesitates to walk too carelessly on them. Every morning from 8 to 9:30 o'clock the servants are seen engaged in a general scrubbing and cleaning operation.

They scrub the doors, the porches, the front steps, the front woodwork and wash the sidewalks. Companies engage to wash windows by the month and their men are seen with force pumps all over the cities washing the panes and giving the front of each house a thorough shower bath; this is not periodical, but it is done every morning, and not at an occasional house, but everywhere. And then you ought to see a Dutch kitchen! This is a genuine treat. I was enabled to see several; not in homes of wealthy, but in ordinary dwellings.

The floor is paved with stone, marble or granite, and is so clean that you could eat your meals off of it with a relish. The walls are covered with snow-white tiling, which shines like lamp reflections. The ceiling is hard wood, painted and varnished, and it is as lustrous in its way as the walls. The stove is generally in a recess. Lace or snow-white linen is hung from this alcove. Imagine it, a kitchen stove behind lace or linen lambrequins. The kitchen utensils are in pantries which have hangings of neat stuff of different sorts; the sinks, brasses, cocks, in fact all the metal work that is visible, is so polished that it glows like burnished steel.

One enjoys a meal prepared in such a kitchen. Such habits of course produce thrift. A lady told me she paid her cook ten florins, $4, a month, and out of this pittance she had managed to save enough to accumulate a neat little nest egg at a bank to prepare a wedding outfit. In cold weather the Hollander blankets his cows and their stables are as clean as their kitchens. One stable I saw had sawdust piled to form pretty little figures; the stalls were bordered with fringe of braided straw, and neat little curtains hung at the entrance, and by the proper use of disinfectants and thorough, careful cleansing the odor was the perfume of hay, and not a suggestion of stable smell could be detected.—Letter in Chattanooga Times.

She Knew the Difference.

The Boston papers continue to report anecdotes which show that the children of the city are not likely soon to lose their reputation for superior taste and intelligence.

A four year-old girl created a laugh the other night in one of the public parks. The band did not arrive so promptly as she expected, and she began to fear that it would not come at all.

"Never mind," said her father consolingly, "if it doesn't come I'll sing you a song."

"I don't wan't you to sing," persisted the discriminating child, "I want some music."—Boston Transcript.

An Illinois farmer thinks that sweet apples are better for hogs than any root crop. He says a hog will leave a clover patch to eat sweet apples, and he thinks apples will make more fat and muscle than clover. It puts the hair in shape, cools the stomach and intestines, regulates the bowels, and makes them voracious feeders, and he thinks it tends to fatten them as any other portion of the rations.

Saved —the life that is fighting against Consumption.

Only—act promptly.

Put it off, and nothing can save you. But, if taken in time, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will certainly cure.

It must be done through the blood—and the "Discovery" is the most potent blood-cleanser, strength-restorer, and flesh-builder that's known to medical science. The scrofulous affection of the lungs that's called Consumption, and every form of Scrofula and blood-taints, all yield to it. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma, and all severe, lingering Coughs, it's an unequaled remedy. It's the only one that's guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, you have your money back.

"We promise to cure your Catarrh, perfectly and permanently, no matter how bad your case or of how long standing—or we'll pay you $500." That's what the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy say to every sufferer from Catarrh. And they mean it.

Many a life has been lost because of the taste of cod-liver oil.

If Scott's Emulsion did nothing more than take that taste away, it would save the lives of some at least of those that put off too long the means of recovery.

It does more. It is half-digested already. It slips through the stomach as if by stealth. It goes to make strength when cod-liver oil would be a burden.

A Dog's Endurance.

A remarkable instance of endurance in the case of a dog is recorded in an American scientific journal. On the night of September 27 last the janitor of Parker Hall, Manasquan, New Jersey, unlocked his ticket office to put away some old tickets, and found a dog crawling about his feet in a condition of extreme emaciation. The office had not been opened since September 1 so that the dog had subsided for twenty-seven days without food or water. Some old tickets and a cigar box had been chewed to bits by the famishing animal. A loaf of bread and water to drink was given him and eagerly devoured. He soon recovered.

HIS MEANS OF SUPPORT.

They Were Present in Court, but the Judge Heeded Them Not.

"This makes the third time that you have appeared before me charged with begging on the streets of Atlanta," said the judge, "and, although you are a woman, I will have to send you up for thirty days."

"Please don't do it, judge," sobbed the woman. "I have a large family to support, and what would my husband and my children do if you were to send me up?"

"Your husband? Have you, indeed, a husband?"

"Yes, your honor," said a man, stepping forward from the crowd, "I'm her husband, and I want to ask you to be lenient with her. She makes out she's too sick to work, but if you let her off this time I'll see to it that she works in the future and supports her family."

"I don't think you will," said the judge. "In fact, I am going to let the woman go and send you up for six months as a vagrant. You have no visible means of support."

And the man muttered as he was marched out: "No visible means of support? Good Lord! Ain't my wife in court?"—Atlanta Constitution.

A Big Regular Army.

The mightiest host of this sort is the army of invalids whose bowels, livers and stomachs have been regulated by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. A regular habit of body is brought about through using the Bitters, not by violently agitating and griping the intestines, but by reinforcing their energy and causing a flow of the bile into its proper channel. Malaria, la grippe, dyspepsia, and a tendency to inactivity of the kidneys, are conquered by the Bitters.

THE CHILIAN FUSS.

President Harrison's Message on the Trouble With the Chileans Goes to Congress,

With Its Proof That the United States Has Been Repeatedly Insulted by Chile.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25.—The following is the full text of President Harrison's message on the Chilean trouble sent to congress to-day:

To the Senate and House of Representatives: In my annual message, delivered to congress at the beginning of the present session, after a brief statement of the facts then in the possession of this government touching the assault in the streets of Valparaiso, Chile, upon the sailors of the United States steamship Baltimore, on the evening of the 16th of October last, I said:

"This government is now awaiting the result of an investigation which has been conducted by the criminal court at Valparaiso. It is reported unofficially that the investigation is about completed, and it is expected that the result will soon be communicated to this government, together with some adequate and satisfactory response to the note by which the attention of Chile was called to this incident. If these just expectations should be disappointed or further needless delay intervene I will, by a special message, bring this matter again to the attention of congress for such action as may be necessary."

In my opinion the time has now come when I should lay before the congress and the country the correspondence between this government and the government of Chile from the time of the breaking out of the revolution against Balmaceda, together with all other facts in the possession of the executive department relating to this matter. The diplomatic correspondence is herewith transmitted, together with some correspondence between the naval officers for the time in command on Chilean waters and the secretary of the navy, and also the evidence taken at the Mare Island yard since the arrival of the Baltimore at San Francisco. I do not deem it necessary in this communication to attempt any full analysis of the correspondence or of the evidence. A brief restatement of the international questions involved and of the reasons why the responses of the Chilean government are unsatisfactory is all that I deem necessary.

EGAN'S ACTIONS APPROVED.

It may be well at the outset to say that, whatever may have been said in this country or in Chile in criticism of Mr. Egan, our minister at Santiago, the true history of this exciting period in Chilean affairs, from the outbreak of the revolution until this time, discloses no act on the part of Mr. Egan unworthy of his position or that could justly be the occasion of serious animadversions or criticisms. He has, I think, on the whole, borne himself in very trying circumstances with dignity, discretion and courage and has conducted the correspondence with ability, courtesy and fairness.

It is worth while also at the beginning to say that the right of Mr. Egan to give shelter in the legation to certain adherents of the Balmaceda government who applied to him for asylum has not been denied by the Chilean authorities, nor has any demand been made for the surrender of these refugees. That there was urgent need of asylum is shown by Mr. Egan's note of Aug. 24, 1891, describing the disorders that prevailed in Santiago, and by the evidence of Capt. Schley as to the pillage and violence that prevailed at Valparaiso. The correspondence discloses, however, that the request of Mr. Egan for a safe conduct from the country, in behalf of these refugees, was denied. The precedents cited by him in the correspondence, particularly the case of the revolution in Peru in 1865, did not leave the Chilean government in a position to deny the right of asylum to political refugees and seemed very clearly to support Mr. Egan's contention that a safe conduct to neutral territory was a necessary and acknowledged incident of the asylum. These refugees have very recently, without formal safe conduct, but by the acquiescence of the Chilean authorities, been placed on board the Yorktown and are now being conveyed to Callao, Peru. This incident might be considered wholly closed manifested toward this government by the close and offensive police surveillance of the legation premises, which was maintained during most of the period of the stay of the refugees therein. After the date of my annual message and up to the time of the transfer of the refugees to the Yorkton, the legation premises seem to have been surrounded by police, in uniform, and police agents or detectives, in citizens' dress, who offensively scrutinized persons entering or leaving the legation and, on one or more occasions, arrested members of the minister's family. Commander Evans, who by my direction, recently visited Mr. Egan at Santiago, in his telegram to the navy department, described the legation as a "veritable prison," and states that the police agents or detectives were, after his arrival, withdrawn during his stay. It appears further, from the note of Mr. Egan of Nov. 20, 1891, that on one occasion at least these police agents, whom he declares to be known to him, invaded the legation premises, pounding on its windows and using insulting and threatening language toward persons therein. This breach of the right of a minister to freedom from police espionage and restraint seems to have been so flagrant that the Argentine minister, who was dean of the diplomatic corps, having observed it, felt called upon to protest against it to the Chilean minister of foreign affairs. The Chilean authorities have, as will be observed from the correspondence, charged the refugees and the inmates of the legation with insulting the police; but it seems to me incredible that men whose lives were in jeopardy, and whose safety could only be secured by retirement and quietness, should have sought to provoke a collision which could only end in their destruction, or to aggravate their condition by intensifying a popular feeling that, at one time, so threatened the legation as to require Mr. Egan to appeal to the minister of foreign affairs.

THE BALTIMORE ASSAULT.

But the most serious incident disclosed by the correspondence is that of the attack on the sailors of the Baltimore in the streets of Valparaiso on the 16th of October last. In my annual message, speaking upon the information then in my possession, I said: "So far as I have yet been able to learn, no other explanation of this bloody work has been suggested than that it had its origin in hostility to these men as sailors of the United States, wearing the uniform of their government, and not in any individual act or personal animosity."

We have now received from the Chilean government an abstract of the conclusions of the fiscal general upon the testimony taken by the judge of crimes in an investigation which was made to extend over nearly three months. I very much regret to be compelled to say that this report does not enable me to modify the conclusions announced in my annual message. I am still of the opinion that our sailors were assaulted, beaten, stabbed and killed, not for anything they or any of them had done, but for what the government of the United States had done, or was charged with having done, by its civil officers and naval commanders. If that be the true aspect of the case, the injury was to the government of the United States, not to these poor sailors, who were assaulted in a manner so brutal and so cowardly. Before attempting to give an outline of the facts upon which this conclusion rests, I think it right to say a word or two upon

THE LEGAL ASPECT OF THE CASE.

The Baltimore was in the harbor of Valparaiso by virtue of that general invitation which nations are held to extend to the war vessels of other powers with which they have friendly relations. This invitation, I think, must be held ordinarily to embrace the privilege of such communication with the shore as is reasonable, necessary and proper for the comfort and convenience of the officers and men of such vessels. Capt. Schley testifies that when his vessel returned to Valparaiso, Sept. 14, the city officers, as is customary, extended the hospitalities of the city to his officers and crew. It is not claimed that every personal collision or injury in which a sailor or officer of such naval vessel visiting the shore may be involved raises an international question; but I am clearly of the opinion that where such sailors or officers are assaulted by a resident populace, animated by hostility to the government whose uniform these sailors and officers wear, and in resentment of acts done by their government, not by them, their nation must take notice of the event as one involving an infraction of its rights and dignity; not in a secondary way, as where a citizen is injured and presents his claim through his own government, but in a primary way, precisely as if its minister or consul or the flag itself had been the object of the same character of assault.

The officers and sailors of the Baltimore were in the harbor of Valparaiso under the orders of their government, not by their own choice. They were upon the shore by the implied invitation of the government of Chile and with the approval of their commanding officer; and it does not distinguish their case from that of a consul that his stay is more permanent or that he holds the express invitation of the local government to justify his longer residence. Nor does it affect the question that the injury was the act of a mob. If there had been no participation by the police or military in this cruel work, and no neglect on their part to extend protection, the case would still be one, in my opinion, when its extent and character are understood, involving international rights.

BLOODY WORK.

The incidents of the affair are briefly as follows: On the 16th of October last Capt. Schley, commanding the United States steamship Baltimore, gave shore leave to 117 petty officers and sailors of his ship. These men left the ship about 1:30 p. m. No incident of violence occurred, none of our men were arrested, no complaint was lodged against them, nor did any collision or outbreak occur until about 6 o'clock p. m.

Capt. Schley states that he was himself on shore and about the streets of the city until 5:30 p. m.; that he met very many of his men who were upon leave; that they were sober and were conducting themselves with propriety, saluting Chilean and other officers as they met them. Other officers of the ship and Capt. Jenkins, of the merchant ship Keweenaw, corroborate Capt. Schley as to the general sobriety and good behavior of our men. The Sisters of Charity at the hospital to which our wounded men were taken, when inquired of, stated that they were sober when received. If the situation had been otherwise we must believe that the Chilean police authorities would have made arrests. About 6 p. m. the assault began, and it is remarkable that the investigation by the judge of crimes, though so protracted, does not enable him to give any more satisfactory account of its origin than is found in the statement that it began between drunken sailors. Repeatedly in the correspondence it is asserted that it was impossible to learn the precise cause of the riot. The minister of foreign affairs, Matta, in his telegram to Mr. Montt, under date Dec. 31, states that the quarrel began between two sailors in a tavern, and was continued in the street, persons who were passing joining in it.

The testimony of Talbot, an apprentice, who was with Riggin, is that the outbreak in which they were involved began by a Chilean sailor spitting in the face of Talbot, which was resented by a knock down. It appears that Riggin and Talbot were at the time unaccompanied by any others of their shipmates.

These two men were immediately beset by a crowd of Chilean citizens and sailors, through which they broke their way to a street car and entered it for safety. They were pursued, driven from the car, and Riggin was so seriously beaten that he fell in the street apparently dead. There is nothing in the report of Chilean investigation made to us that seriously impeaches this testimony. It appears from Chilean sources that almost instantly, with a suddenness that strongly implies a mob, stated by the police authorities at one time to number 2,000 and at another 1,000, were engaged in the assault upon our sailors, who are represented as resisting with stones, clubs and bright arms. The report of the intendente of Oct. 30 states that the fight began at 6 p. m. in three streets, which are named; that information was received at the intendencia at 6:15 and that the police arrived on the scene at 6:30, a full half hour after the assault began. At that time he says that a mob of 2,000 men had collected and that for several squares there was the appearance of a real battle field.

The scene at this point is very graphically set before us by the Chilean testimony. The American sailors, who after so long an examination have not been found guilty of any breach of the peace, so far as the Chilean authorities are able to discover, unarmed and defenseless, are fleeing for their lives pursued by overwhelming numbers and fighting only to aid their own escape from death or succor some mate whose life is in greater peril. Eighteen of them are brutally stabbed and beaten, while one Chilean seems from the report to have suffered some injury, but how serious or with what character of weapon, or whether by a missile thrown by our men or by some of his fellow rioters is unascertained.

The pretense that our men were fighting "with stones, clubs and bright arms" in view of these facts is incredible. It is further refuted by the fact that our prisoners when searched were absolutely without arms, only seven pen knives being found in the possession of the men arrested, while there were received by our men more than thirty stab wounds, every one of which was inflicted in the back and almost every contused wound was on the back or back of the head. The evidence of the ship's officer of the day is that even the jack knives of the men were taken from them before leaving the ship.

CONVINCING PROOF.

As to the brutal nature of the treatment received by our men, the following extract from the account given of the affair by the La Patria newspaper of Valparaiso of Oct. 17 cannot be regarded as too friendly:

"The Yankees, as soon as their pursuers gave chase, went by way of the Calle del Arsenal toward the city car station. In the presence of an ordinary number of citizens, among whom were some sailors, the North Americans took seats in the street car to escape from the stones which the Chileans threw at them. It was believed for an instant that the North Americans had saved themselves from popular fury, but such was not the case. Scarcely had the car begun to move when a crowd gathered around and stopped its progress. Under these circumstances and without any cessation of the howling and throwing of stones at the North Americans, the conductor entered the car and seeing the risk of the situation to the vehicle ordered them to go out. At the instant the sailors left the car, in the midst of a hail of stones, the conductor received a stone blow on the head. One of the Yankee sailors managed to escape in the direction of the Plaza Ecelrigat, the other was felled to ground by a stone. Managing to raise himself from the ground where he lay, he staggered in an opposite direction from the station. In front of the house of Senor Mazzini he was again wounded, falling senseless and breathless."

No amount of evasion or subterfuge is able to cloud our clear vision of this brutal work. It should be noticed in this connection that the Americans arrested after an examination were during the four days following the arrest every one discharged, no charge of any breach of the peace or other criminal conduct having been sustained against a single one of them. The judge of crimes, Foster, in a note to the intendente, under date of Oct. 22, before the dispatch from this government of the following day, which aroused the authorities of Chile to a better sense of the gravity of the affair, says: "Having presided temporarily over this court in regard to the seamen of the United States cruiser Baltimore who have been tried on account of the deplorable conduct which took place, etc."

AMERICAN SAILORS VINDICATED.

The noticeable point here is that our sailors had been tried before Oct. 22, and that the trial resulted in their acquittal and return to their vessel. It is quite remarkable and quite characteristic of the management of this affair by the Chilean police authorities that we should now be advised that Seaman Davidson, of the Baltimore, had been included in the indictment, his offense being, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that he attempted to defend a shipmate against an assailant who was striking at him with a knife. The perfect vindication of our men is furnished by this report; one only is found to have been guilty of criminal fault, and that for an act clearly justified.

As to the part taken by the police in the affair the case made by Chile is also far from satisfactory. The point where Riggin was killed is only three minutes walk from the police station and not more than twice that distance from the intendencia, and yet, according to their official report, a full half hour passed after the assault began before the police were upon the ground. It has been stated that all but two of our men have said that the police did their duty. The evidence taken at Mare Island shows that if such a statement was procured from our men it was accomplished by requiring them to sign a writing in a language they did not understand, and by their representation that it was a mere declaration that they had taken no part in the disturbance. Lieut. McCrea, who acted as interpreter, says in his evidence that when our sailors were examined before the court the subject of the conduct of the police was so carefully avoided that he reported the fact to Capt. Schley on his return to the vessel.

HATRED FOR THE YANKEES.

The evidences in existence of animosity towards our sailors in the minds of the sailors of the Chilean navy and of the populace of Valparaiso are so abundant and various as to leave no doubt in the minds of any one who will examine the papers submitted. It manifested itself in threatening and insulting gestures towards our men as they passed the Chilean man-of-war in their boats and in the derisive and abusive epithets with which they greeted every appearance of an American sailor on the evening of the riot. Capt. Schley reports that boats from the Chilean war ships several times went out of their course to cross the bows of his boats, compelling them to back water. He complained of the discourtesy and it was corrected.

That this feeling was shared by men of higher rank is shown by the incident related by Surgeon Stitt, of the Baltimore. After the battle of Pacilla, he with other medical officers of the war vessels in the neighborhood gave assistance to the wounded in the hospitals. The son of a Chilean army officer of high rank was under his care, and when his father discovered it he flew into a passion, and said he would rather have his son die than have Americans touch him and at once had him removed from the ward. This feeling is well concealed in the dispatches of the foreign office. The Chilean boatmen in the bay refused even for large offers of money to return our sailors who crowded the mole to their ship when they where endeavoring to escape from the city on the night of the assault. The market boats of the Baltimore were threatened and even quite recently the gig of Commander Evans, of the Yorktown, was stoned while waiting for him at the mole.

A PREMEDITATED ATTACK.

The evidence of our sailors clearly shows that the attack was expected by the Chilean people, that threats had been made against our men, and that, in one case somewhat early in the afternoon, the keeper of one house into which some of our men had gone closed his establishment in anticipation of an attack which he advised them would be made upon them as darkness came on.

In a report of Capt. Schley to the navy department he says: "In the only interview that I had with Judge Foster, [illegible] he informed me that the assault on our men was the outcome of hatred for our men among the lower classes because they thought we had sympathized with the Balmaceda government on account of the Itata matter, whether with reason or without he could not admit, but such he thought the explanation of the assault at that time. Several of our men sought security from the mob by such complete or partial changes in their dress as would conceal the fact of their being seamen of the Baltimore and found it then possible to walk the streets without molestation. These incidents conclusively establish that the attack was upon the uniform, the nationality, and not upon the men.

WHY THEY HATE US.

The origin of this feeling is probably found in the refusal of this government to give recognition to the congressional party before it had established itself, in the seizure of the Itata for an alleged violation of the neutrality law, in the cable incident and in the charge that Admiral Brown conveyed information to Valparaiso of the landing at Quinteros.

It is not my purpose to enter here any defense of the action of this government in these matters. It is enough for the present purpose to say that if there was any breach of international comity or duty on our part, it should have been made the subject of official complaint through diplomatic channels or of reprisals, for which a full responsibility was assumed. We cannot consent to these incidents and these perversions of the truth used to excite a murderous attack upon our unoffending sailors, and the government of Chile go acquitted of a responsibility.

In fact, the conduct of this government during the war in Chile pursued those lines of international duty which we had so strongly insisted upon on the part of other nations when this country was in the throes of a civil conflict. We continued the established diplomatic relations with the government in power until it was overthrown, and cordially and promptly recognized the new government when it was established. The good offices of the government were offered to bring about a peaceful adjustment, and the interposition of Mr. Egan to mitigate severity and shelter adherents of the congressional party were effective and frequent. The charge against Admiral Brown with any one who knows his high personal and professional character. Recurring to the evidence of our sailors, I think it is shown that there were several distinct assaults, and so nearly simultaneous as to show that they did not spread from one point. A press summary of the report of the Fiscal shows that the evidence of the Chilean officials and others was in conflict as to the place of origin, several places being named by different witnesses as the locality where the first outbreak occurred. This, if correctly reported, shows that there were several distinct outbreaks, and so nearly at the same time as to cause this confusion. The La Patria, in the same issue from which I have already quoted, after describing the killing of Riggin and the fight which from that point extended to the mole, says:

IS TOO BASE TO GAIN CREDENCE

"At the same time, in other streets of the port, the Yankee sailors fought fiercely with the people of the town, who believed to see in them incarnate enemies of the Chilean navy."

The testimony of Capt. Jenkins, of the American merchant ship Keweenaw, who had gone to Valparaiso for repairs and who was a witness of some part of the assault upon the crew of the Baltimore, is strongly corroborative of the testimony of our own sailors, when he says that he saw Chilean sentries drive back a seaman seeking shelter, upon a mob that was pursuing him. The officers and men of Capt. Jenkins' ship furnish the most conclusive testimony as to the indignities which were practiced toward Americans in Valparaiso. When American sailors, even of merchant ships, can only secure their safety by denying their nationality, it must be time to readjust our relations with a government that permits such demonstrations. As to the evidence of our sailors shows that our men were struck and beaten by police officers before and after arrest, and that one at least was dragged with a lasso about his neck by a mounted policeman. That the death of Riggin was the result of a rifle shot fired by a policeman or soldier on duty is shown directly by the testimony of Johnson, in whose arms he was at the time, and by the evidence of Charles Langen, an American sailor not then a member of the Baltimore's crew, who stood close by and saw the transaction. The Chilean authorities do not pretend to fix the responsibility of this shot upon any particular person, but avow their inability to ascertain who fired it. Further than that it was fired from a crowd.

The character of the wound, as described by two surgeons of the Baltimore, clearly supports his opinion that it was made by a rifle ball, the orifice of exit being as much as an inch or an inch and a quarter in width. When shot the poor fellow was unconscious and in the arms of a comrade, who was endeavoring to carry him to a neighboring drug store for treatment. The story of the police that, in coming up the street, they passed these men and left them behind them, is inconsistent with their own statement as to the direction of their approach and with their duty to protect them, and is clearly disproved. In fact, Riggin was not behind but in front of the advancing force and was not standing in the crowd, but was unconscious and supported in the arms of Johnson when he was shot.

FAR FROM AN APOLOGY.

After summarizing the correspondence up to a certain point, the president says:

The communications of the Chilean government in relation to this cruel and disastrous attack upon our men, as will appear from the correspondence, have not in any degree taken the form of a manly and satisfactory expression of regret, much less an apology. The event was of so serious a character that if the injuries suffered by our men had been wholly the result of an accident in a Chilean port, the incident was grave enough to have called for some public expression of sympathy and regret from the local authorities. It is not enough to say that the affair was lamentable, for humanity would require that expression, even if the beating and killing of our men had been justifiable. It is not enough to say that the incident is regretted, coupled with the statement that the affair was not an unfrequent occurrence in ports where foreign sailors are accustomed to meet. It is not for a government to seek for words of small or equivocal meaning in which to convey to a friendly power an apology for an offense so atrocious as this.

In the case of the assault by a mob in New Orleans upon the Spanish consulate in 1851, Mr. Webster wrote to the Spanish minister, Mr. Calderon, that the acts complained of were "a disgraceful and flagrant breach of duty and propriety," and that his government "regrets them as deeply as Minister Calderon or his government could possibly do;" that "these acts have caused the president great pain and he thinks a proper acknowledgment is due to his majesty." He invited the Spanish consul to return to his post, guaranteeing protection, and offered to salute the Spanish flag if the consul should come in a Spanish vessel. Such a treatment by the government of Chile of this assault would have been more creditable to the Chilean authorities; and much less can hardly be satisfactory to a government that values

ITS DIGNITY AND HONOR.

In our note of Oct. 23 last, which appears in the correspondence, after receiving the report of the board of officers appointed by Capt. Schley to investigate the affair, the Chilean government was advised of the aspect which it then assumed and called upon for any facts in its possession that might tend to modify the unfavorable impressions which our report had created. It is very clear from the correspondence that, before the receipt of this note, the examination was regarded by the police authorities as practically closed. It was, however, reopened and protracted through a period of nearly three months. We might justly have complained of this unreasonable delay, but in view of the fact that the government of Chile was still provisional, and with a disposition to be forbearing and hopeful of a friendly termination, I have awaited the report which has but recently been made.

On the 21st. inst I caused to be communicated to the government of Chile by the American minister at Santiago, the conclusions of this government after a full consideration of all the evidence and of every suggestion affecting this matter, and to these conclusions I adhere. They were stated as follows:

First—That the assault is not relieved of the aspect which the early information of the event gave to it, viz: That of an attack upon the uniform of the United States navy, having its origin and motive in a feeling of hostility to this government and not in any act of the sailors or any of them.

Second—That the public authorities of Valparaiso flagrantly failed in their duty to protect our men, and that some of the police and of the Chilean soldiers and sailors were themselves guilty of unprovoked assaults upon our sailors before and after arrest. He (the president) thinks the preponderance of the evidence and the inherent probabilities lead to the conclusion that Riggin was killed by the police or soldiers.

Third—That he (the president) is therefore compelled to bring the case back to the position taken by this government in the note of Mr. Wharton of Oct. 23 last, and to ask for a suitable apology and for some adequate reparation for the injury done to this government.

MATTA'S INSULTING NOTE.

In the same note the attention of the Chilean government was called to the offensive character of a note addressed by Mr. Matta, ex-minister of foreign affairs, to Mr. Montt, its minister at this capital, on the 11th ult. This dispatch was not officially communicated to this government, but as Mr. Montt was directed to translate it and give it to the press of this country, it seemed to me that it could not pass without official notice. It was not only undiplomatic, but grossly insulting to our naval officers and to the executive department, as it directly imputed untruth and insincerity to the reports of the naval officers and to the official communications made by the executive department to congress. It will be observed that I have notified the Chilean government that unless this note is at once withdrawn and an apology as public as the offense made I will terminate diplomatic relations.

The request for the recall of Mr. Egan upon the ground that he was not persona grata was unaccompanied by any suggestion that could properly be used in support of it, and I infer that the request is based upon official acts of Mr. Egan which have received the approval of this government. But, however that may be, I could not consent to consider such a question until it had first been settled whether correspondence with Chile could be conducted upon a basis of mutual respect.

MUST COME TO TIME.

In submitting these papers to congress for that grave and patriotic consideration which the questions involved demand I desire to say that I am of the opinion that the demands made of Chile by this government should be adhered to and enforced.

If the dignity as well as the prestige and influence of the United States are not to be wholly sacrificed we must protect those who in foreign ports display the flag, wear the colors of this government, against insult, brutality and death, inflicted in resentment of the acts of this government, and not for any fault of their own. It has been my desire in every way to cultivate friendly and intimate relations with all the governments of this hemisphere. We do not covet their territory, we desire their peace and prosperity. We look for no advantage in our relations with them except the increased exchanges of commerce upon a basis of mutual benefit. We regret every civil contest that disturbs their peace and paralyzes their development, and are always ready to give our good offices for the restoration of peace. It must, however, be understood that this government, while exercising the utmost forbearance toward toward weaker powers, will extend its strong and adequate protection to its citizens, to its officers and to its humblest sailor, when made the victims of wantonness and cruelty in resentment, not of their personal misconduce, but of the official acts of their government.

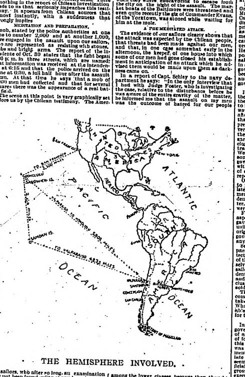
Upon information received that Patrick Shields, an Irishman, and probably a British subject, but at the time a fireman of the American steamer Keweena, in the harbor of Valparaiso for repairs, had been subjected to personal injuries in that city largely by the police, I directed the attorney general to cause the evidence of the officers and the crew of that vessel to be taken upon its arrival in San Francisco, and this testimony is also herewith transmitted. The brutality and even savagery of the treatment of these poor men by the Chilean police would be incredible if the evidence of Shields was not supported by other direct testimony and by the distressing condition of the man himself when he was finally able to reach his vessel. The captain of the vessel says: "He came back a wreck; black from his neck to his hips from beating, weak and stupid, and is still in a kind of paralyzed condition, and has never been able to do duty since."

A claim for reparation has been made in behalf of this man, for, while he was not a citizen of the United States, the doctrines so long held by us expressed in the consular regulations, is: "The principles which are maintained by this government in regard to the protection as distinguished from the relief of seamen are well settled. It is held that the circumstance that the vessel is American is evidence that the seamen aboard are such, and in every regularly documented merchant vessel the crew will find their protection in the flag that covers them."

I have as yet received no reply to our note of the 21st inst., but in my opinion I ought not to delay longer to bring these matters to the attention of congress for such action as may be deemed appropriate.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

Executive Mansion, Jan. 25, 1892.



THE HEMISPHERE INVOLVED.

TROUBLESOME CHILE

President Harrison's Message on the Trouble With the Chileans Goes to Congress,

With Its Proof That the United States Has Been Repeatedly Insulted by Chile.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26.—The correspondence accompanying the president's message was sent to congress to-day. It is of great volume, and would probably fill more than 100 columns of an ordinary newspaper. It dates back as far as Aug. 15, 1890, eighteen months ago, and much of it has been described with sufficient accuracy in the president's message sent to congress at the beginning of the present session and the copious newspaper publications that have been made.

It is divided into three portions, the first comprising correspondence between Mr. Blaine and Mr. Egan, or Mr. Wharton in Mr. Blaine's absence, correspondence between Senor Lazzano, the Chilean minister under the Balmaceda administration, and lastly notes exchanged between Secretary Blaine and Dom Pedro Montt, the present Chilean minister to Washington.

The Egan correspondence begins Aug. 15, 1890, with the statement of the changes in the Balmaceda ministry which constituted a precursor to the revolution. Many chapters of this correspondence are now ancient history, and therefore of little interest at the present juncture. The one fact that is established is that Minister Egan had an abiding faith up to the last moment in the ultimate triumph of Balmaceda over his enemies, and the downfall of the insurgent cause. March 9, 1891, Mr. Egan transmitted to Secretary Blaine a request by the Chilean government that the United States permit one of its ships to carry from Valparaiso to Montevideo a sum of about $1,000,000, bar silver, which is required for the payment of the interest on the national debt abroad; that the Chilean government fears its capture by the revolted fleet if the sum is sent in the regular course of business. March 17, in a dispatch describing in the neighborhood of Iquique, the minister says that the revolution had the undivided sympathy and the active support of the English residents in Chili; that the English superintendents of the nitrate works urged their men to join the revolutionists, and Col. North contributed the sum of 100,000 pounds sterling in its support.

April 14 the minister tells of an effort of the Chilean government to collect duties on exports from insurgent ports, the protests made by the German and British ministers and the assurances he has received that American vessels will not be subjected to any inconvenience. April 21 he telegraphs that the Chilean government urgently requests that the proposition of the Chilean minister for the purchase of a man-of-war from the United States be favorably considered.

Mr. Egan began his efforts as a peace-maker April 24, when he telegraphed for permission to act with the Brazilian minister and French charge in an effort to restore peace, the indications being that mediation would be accepted by both parties. The next day he received Mr. Blaine's permission to act as mediator. May 24 Mr. Egan informs Mr. Blaine that the good offices of the United States, Brazil and France have been most cordially accepted by the government of Chile and the revolutionists, those of England and Germany having been declined.

INCREASING THE NAVY.

A Bill for Eighteen New Vessels of War Introduced in the Senate.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26.—A bill introduced by Senator Hale to-day is of special interest in view of the Chilean imbroglio. For the purpose of increasing the naval establishment the bill authorizes the president to have constructed by contract three battleships of 7,500 to 10,000 tons displacement, two armored coast defense vessels, five gunboats of 800 to 1,200 tons displacement, and eight first-class torpedo boats.

In the contracts for the construction of the vessels such provisions for increased speed, and premiums therefor, shall be made as in the discretion of the secretary of the navy may be deemed advisable. In their construction the provisions of the act of Aug. 3, 1886, for the increase of the naval establishment shall be observed, save that in all their parts the vessels shall be of domestic manufacture. If the secretary of the navy shall be unable to contract at reasonable prices for the building of any of the vessels the bill provides that he may build such vessel, or any part thereof, in navy yards to be designated by the secretary.

Toward the construction of the vessels, with their engines, boilers and machinery, $3,000,000 is appropriated; and towards their armament $1,000,000.

Cabinet Appointments.

OTTAWA, Ont., Jan. 26.—It has been decided by Premier Abbott in what respect the long pending cabinet changes will be made. J. C. Patterson, formerly member of parliament for North Essex, will be made secretary of state. J. A. Chapleau, the present secretary of state, will become minister of customs. Mackenzie Bowell, present minister of customs, will become minister of militia, and Sir Adolph Caron, present minister of militia, will take the postmaster generalship, the present incumbent of the latter office, John Haggart, having been made minister of railways and canals a few days ago. There is no truth in the story that Chapleau has left the cabinet.

The Ownership Decided.

ST. CLOUD, Minn., Special, Jan. 26.—J. D. Sullivan, referee in the case of O. Parker McClure, owner of Prince Mac, against Philo Sweet, the well known driver and trainer, involving the ownership of the pacing mare Madge, has been decided in favor of the plaintiff, Mr. McClure. The mare is at present in the hands of C. E. Bell of Sauk Rapids, and while McClure says she is worth only $850, Sweet claims that the value of the mare is $2,500.

Murdered Eight Girls.

VIENNA, Jan. 26.—The trial opened to-day of Franks Schneider and his wife on the charge of murdering and robbing eight servant girls. Schneider being also charged with violating the girls. Schneider pleaded guilty to violation in two instances and to murder in one instance, and threw the guilt of the other murders on his wife, who he said decoyed the girls to their fate on the pretense of employing them. There was an exciting scene in the court room during the proceedings, due to a violent exchange of accusations between the prisoners.

Wheat is 71 cents.

La grippe is having quite a run here at present.

Postmaster Simon Waring, of Excel, was in town today.

If you want to insure your buildings against fire, call at this office.

Wolves are reported to be exceedingly numerous in this vicinity this winter,

Frank Gravel, of Crookston, was here today selling groceries to our merchants.

John Kupor, of Thief River Falls was in town last Monday on his way to Fertile.

Rev. E, Berlie returned today from Otter Tail county where he has been visiting friends.

M. Murphy a prominent citizen of Hillsboro N. D,, was in town several days last week.

Frank Kratka, the Thief River Falls boomer, was in town today on his way home from Crookston.

The mild weather the past week has been a great help to business and all wish to see it continue.

S. O. Sundet, the proprietor of the Crookston marble works, spent a couple of days in town last week,

J. E. Burkee and wife left last Monday for a short visit among friends in the southern part of the state.

Ole Wiste has been laid up the past week with the prevalant malady, la grippe,

Henry Jackson has been confined to his room for the past week with a serious attack of la grippe. He is now recovering slowly.

Wheat has been moving rather lively this week, about three thousand bushels being marketed on Monday and nearly as much yesterday.

The St. Hilaire train is now provided with a caboose and the mail, express and passengers are not mixed as heretofore.

Considerable wheat is coming here now from Marshall county. A number of farmers coming here who have to haul over thirty miles.

Business has been brisk the past week the mild weather bringing a large number of farmers into town, business is almost as good as before the holidays.

Tim Donovan, formerly of Crookston but now traveling salesman of a Chicago wholesale dry goods firm, was in town today selling goods.

The price of wheat is on the decline again this week. Farmers who are holding for higher prices may have a long time to wait judging from present prospects.

S. M. Dainard is in hard luck. He has been suffering from an attack of the gout and is now having a tussle with the grip. If you want to make music just step on Sam's off toe.

The train boys were compelled to borrow the village fire-engine today to furnish water for their locomotive which ran out of water. The water supply at Ives station has run out.

M. G. Norris, of Crookston, was in town a couple of days the first of the week selling Geo. A. Ralph's map of Polk County. He succeeded in disposing of several, The map is an excellent one and does credit to Mr, Ralph's ability.

Chili has at last come to understand that the United States mean business, and has promised to make due apology They also offer to settle the question of indemnity for the assault on the Baltimore's sailors by leaving it to arbitration by some non-interested country or let the U. S. Supreme Court decide the matter.

We notice that a number of our country exchanges are making considerable of a "roar" because the county commissioners have decided to build a jail at Crookston. Although the county can hardly afford very heavy expense at present, we are badly in need of a jail and something better than the present one must be built or we had better go out of the business of arresting and detaining criminals. The present jail is a disgrace to the county.

Persons visiting their old homes in the East this winter should take along printed matter descriptive of their new homes in the Northwest, Take copies of this paper with you and ask agents of the Great Northern Railway for a supply of publications.

How are you fixed for insurance? Cold weather is coming on and you should protect your property against fire. Call at this office for rates. Remember that we can give you just as low a rate as anyone and give you your choice of several first class companies.

Chicago was the winner in the Democratic National Convention race, and several cities who were sure of being chosen are feeling a trifle sore. St, Paul Democrats do not feel as good as they might and intimate that they did not have a fair show. Chicago did not have a delegation at work and had done but little work to secure the prize, but David B. Hill the man who owns the Democratic party, is responsible for the result.

The Fergus Falls Journal of January 14, makes the following authoritative statement: "Attorney General Clapp states that there seems to be very general misapprehension concerning the provisions of the so called Australian election law passed at the last session of the legislature, While the law applies to all sections of the state it does not apply to the election of township village and school district officers."

We open our pasters free to the world but we don't want the grass tramped to deth.

There air some very able and honest statesman that you can't trust in a hoss trade.

This is Columbia year, says the Dubuque Herald, as it might be called, since it is the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, in honor of which the inauguration of the big centennial in Chicago will be begun; it is also presidential year, and likewise it is leap year in which the ladies who have been slighted and left ungathered by the ungallant batchelors have been granted by popular customs the right to choose a life companion from the ranks of the sterner sex, and can do something more than hint for the proposal which they crave and would accept. Indeed it is a great year all around, and all who see opportunities for them in its embrace should remember that although the year is young, its opportunities are already many,

Commander Dickens of the United States navy who has had a wide experience with the South Americans, thinks that nothing short of punishment will imbue Chili with the proper respect for this government, The rank and file of the people are ignorant of our resources and confident that they can whip us. Nothing but actual force will convince the Chilians that they are not strong enough to insult us with impunity. No deeper insult or wrong could have been offered a nation than the slaughter of her sailors because of the uniform they wore. Firing on our flag is considered a cause for war but butchering our sailors is a worse affront. Bloodshed is more than a point for arbitration. Disputes over money or boundaries can be properly be arbitrated but if a man strikes you in the face you do not care to arbitrate the controversy. The smallest reparation we can demand if we intend to retain our self respect and the respect of the world is that Chili shall offer an abject apology, pay an indemnity and salute our flag.

Many a man is rich without money Thousands of men with nothing in their pockets, and thousands without even a pocket, are rich. A man born with a good sound constitution, a good stomach a good heart and good limbs, a pretty good head piece, is rich, Good bones are better than gold, tough muscles than houses and land, It is better than a landed estate to have the right kind of a father and mother. Good breeds and bad breeds exist among men as really as among herds and horses. Education may do much to check evil tendencies or to develop good ones, but it is a great thing to inherit the right proportion of faculties to start with. The man is rich who has a good disposition, who is naturally kind, patient, cheeiful, hopeful and who has a flavor of wit and fun in his composition. The hardest thing to get on with in this life is a man's own self. A cross, selfish fellow, a despondent and complaining fellow, a timid and care-burdened man, these are all born deformed on the inside. They do not limp but their thoughts sometimes do.—Source unknown,

In connection with Mr. Labouchere's statement that the Dominion of Canada is destined to become at an early day, an independent nation or a part of the United States, it is interesting to read in recent dispatches of the growing feeling of New Foundland against the imperial government. The people of that island are indignant at the favors extended by Great Britain, at their expense, to French fishermen, and in retaliation are doing all in their power to favor Americans. It is proposed by the island government to give the free run of their coasts to Americans, even to allow them to seine their own herring which is a hitherto unheard-of privelege and one that naturally causes great joy to the Gloucester fishermen. The restrictions placed upon Canadian fishermen, on the other hand, are being not only rigorously enforced but even increased.—Grand Forks Herald,

St. Paul Dispatch: The request of the Chilian government at this late day that Minister Egan be recalled has a peculiar suggestiveness about it, If as is intimated Mr. Egan's note of Oct. 26 is one of his chief offences, why was not official notice of the fact given long before this? and if his presence in Santiago has not been agreeable to Chili why was not the request for his recall made long ago? We do not say that there has not existed reason why he should not be recalled. We never approved of his appointment in the first place. The circumstances attending it and the known character of the man were in a high degree reprehensible. It would have been an act of justice to our own country had he been recalled ere he put foot in Santiago,

The present, however, is the first official intimation that we have of the Chilian government entertaining an objection to his presence and the fact that it comes at this juncture seems to indicate that Chili is looking about for some way of getting out of its difficulty without making unconditional reparation.

Philadelphia, Jan. 22.—Shipping circles in this city were stirred up today over a report that the government had impressed the American line steamship Ohio to be used in case of war. The report was strengthened by the fact that orders were given not to take aboard the cargo for the vessel that was lying on the dock and that instead coal was being rapidly put in. The officers of the steamship company admitted that the Ohio had been taken off her regular trip between this port and Liverpool, but they declined to say for what purpose she was to be used, They were careful however to say that she had not been chartered by the government. From another reliable source it was learned that without doubt the government had exercised its right to take possession of any merchant vessel sailing under the national flag for its own use when war or the probability of war demands it and under this law had impressed the Ohio. It was also learned from the same sources that the Ohio will take aboard 400 tons of coal as ballast and Monday or Tuesday next proceed to New York There she will lie until the present difficulty with Chili has been arranged satisfactorily or war is declared.

St. Paul Globe: The managers of the state fair are reported to be considering a proposition to increase the amounts to be paid as premiums in the horse and cattle departments at the coming fair. This, it is needless to say is a good suggestion and deserves favorable action The state fair should be first of all an agricultural affair and the products of the farm should receive the greatest share of the time and attention of the managers. The breeding of fine grades of horses and cattle have come to be one of the greatest interests of the state, one too, for which Minnesota possesses peculiar advantages, During the past five years hundreds of stock farms have sprung into existance all over the state whose proprietors devote themselves to the breeding of high grade cattle and horses, Many of these men have done an extensive importing business especially in the way of bringing in fine horses. One of the gratifying results of all this has been the improvement in the grades of both cattle and horses. The native scrubs have largely been supplanted by high bred cattle, At the present time the stockmen of Minnesota are doing a large business all over the country and particularly in the states to the east of us. This is capable of almost indefinate expansion and no inducement that the state fair officials can offer to the men who have brought it about will fail to secure the indorsement of the agriculturists of the state,

One of the surviving officers of Kane's pioneer arctic expedition, Captain J. Wall Wilson, has long been a resident of New York. He is a lively and well preserved old gentleman, with a fund of anecdotes relating to the days when he ate boiled shoes and blubber by the light of the aurora borealis. Captain Wilson says that so far as he can learn there is only one other of the officers who accompanied the expedition now alive.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company has let the contract for fifty new locomotives of the heaviest pattern, to cost nearly $500,000, and to be used on the heavy grades between Wheeling and Harper's Ferry.

It is not at all likely that the Baltimore and Ohio will assume control of its latest purchase, the Pittsburg and Western, until after the annual meeting of the stockholders of the latter company next May, when the bargain will no doubt be formally ratified on their part, as it has already been on the part of the Baltimore and Ohio.

The Pittsburg Post says: "For a safe running of passenger trains the Allegheny valley has a phenomenal and altogether unequaled record. A few words tell the story. During nineteen years past not one passenger on the river division of the road has lost his life by accident, and for eighteen years past there has not been one fatality on the other half of the road, the low grade division."

The Hindoos have a cocoanut festival every year at the end of August to mark the beginning of the end of the monsoon. During the festival athletic contests take place and wandering minstrels recite their tales and poems.

In selecting strong timber weight has very little consideration. Only a man with experience can cull the good from the bad timber with almost an infallible judgment, and probably without the ability to tell why he makes his selection. Color has little to do with it, weight something, timber sense more.

Mr. Caimpi, an opera singer, has secured a verdict in a suit for $100,000 against the London Daily Telegraph, that journal having published an article that he could no longer be considered a singer after his interpretation of the role of Don Juan. The jury returned a verdict for one farthing for the plaintiff.

It is announced that Katie Rooney and her father have become friends again. While Pat was playing in Rochester, N. Y., she occupied a box and handed a basket of flowers to him bearing a card and the words, "Father, forgive and forget." He did, and asked her to dinner, but she is still playing in another company.

With the view of stimulating the energy of the rising generation of authors, the Italian government last year offered a prize of 10,000 francs for a good play which would be produced in the course of the winter. Only eight authors sent in their productions, and the jury specially nominated by the government came to the conclusion that none of them deserved the prize.

THE ANIMAL KINGDOM.

The hen so common in these days originated in the Bankiva jungle, where wild chickens are still to be found.

A French beekeeper has experimented with his bees as carriers of dispatches. One difficulty of the bee service is that the insects will not return over a distance of more than two or three miles.

Least attractive among the insects which give fight are the so called "electric centipedes"—black crawlers with many legs, which have been likened to serpents' skeletons in miniature. They move in a snakelike fashion, forward or backward, leaving behind them a bright track of phosphoric light.

In olden times a bird called a phœnix was thought to live in the deserts of Arabia. His lease of life was said to be 500 years, at the end of which time he built a nest of spices and fanned it into a flame with his wings. The flame reduced the bird to ashes, out of which he sprang to live another 500 years.

One of the most singular looking creatures that ever walked the earth or "swam the waters under the earth" is the world famous manfaced crab of Japan. "CHAMMIE" COULDN'T SEE IT.

One Instance Where the Principle of "Promotion" Failed to Succeed.

Two little bootblacks stood looking wistfully in the show window of a Clark street cigar store one afternoon. They were typical street arabs, with all the tough ways and bad habits of their class. They wanted to smoke, and their eyes were bent upon a box, "cabbage-leaf" cheroots, which were labled "two cents each."

"Say, Chammie," said the taller arab, "I t'ink I'd injoy a bloody good smoke just now."

"I'm wid yer," replied "Chammie," smacking his lips in anticipation of a cigar.

"But yer see, de on'y trouble wid me is dat I'm plum broke."

"Is dat so? Well I've got two cents."

"Give it ter me, den."

"What fur?"

"Why, ter buy wan ob dem air sheroots, in course."

"But I wanter smoke too."

"'N so do I."

"How kin both of us do it?"

"I'll tell yer wat tu do. Yer must give me de two cents an' we'll organize a stock company. Yer see you is de capitalist. I'm de inventor; so yer give de coin to me, den I buys de cigar and yez becomes a stockholder. See?"

"Yas."

"An' yer smokes it, don't yer?"

"Yas, but don't yer see, I'm de organizer, so in course I smokes de cigar."

"What'll I do?"

"Why, you're de stockholder, yer kin spit. See?"

A ONE-ENDED DIALOGUE.

The Editor Got Himself Into Trouble Through the Telephone

The crimes editor was at the telephone trying to gather in an item about a sudden death, says the Detroit Tribune.

"Is this Dr. Sawkins?"

"Oh, it's Dr. Ratcinski, is it? Well, doctor, how did the man die?"

"This ain't the doctor at all, and your name is what?"

"You're the man that died? How can that be?"

"Oh, you saw the man before he died. Well, who are you?

"Is your name Kolasinske, or Pomerinske?

"Breckinride? Is that you or the man that died?

"Beg pardon, but what is the name of the man who died?

"Thompson? A relation of——?

"Oh, he had no relations? Well, was he dead when the doctor found him, or did he die afterwards?

"The doctor didn't leave him till he was dead? Till he was dead, the man or the doctor?

"His funeral is to-morrow. (Aside.) I wish it was your funeral.

"You want the coroner to come there right away? This ain't the coroner."

With a long V-shaped sigh that sounded like the last undulating plunk of a sinking soul, the crimes editor hung up the telephone and crept wearily back to his den, as one who would say: "Oh that I had died while yet a mere child."

A Mother's Terrible Crime.

LONDON, Special.—A dispatch from Nottingham states that a widow named Castings, who had a milliner's shop on the principal street of that place, murdered her two children to-day. After killing her children the woman committed suicide. Mrs. Castings used a coal hammer in carrying out her fiendish plan, and with it she had battered the heads of her victims so that they were hardly recognizable.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

"And so, Lizzy, by merely answering truthfully such questions as have been put to me, I have been driven forth from my employers' office."

"And serves you right! I think you must have been out of your senses!" exclaimed Lizzy, flushing deeply at this double-folly; as she would have termed it, at this double ruin, as she felt it to be, "It's enough to ruin your employers' business. I'm sure I, for one, shouldn't blame them if they were to sue you for slander! Now what are you to do?"

"God knows! I do not."

"I know one thing! If you had had the slightest regard for me, you would not have acted in such a manner as to bring yourself to beggary within one month of our marriage!"

"Do you blame me for telling the truth?"

"Oh, the truth!" exclaimed Lizzy, in extreme disgust. "Yes, I do blame you! It was sheer madness to tell the truth to your customers. I don't think they have a right to expect it. If I were to tell the truth to our customers, we might go into the Insolvent Court to-morrow. Truth, indeed! I shall sell this bonnet that I am making for double its cost, by saying it is a Parisian bonnet; well, it is just as good; being made after one. If you want to do business, and get along in this world, you must not be particular."

"More is the pity," said Joseph sadly.

"And as for you, Mr. Truth-teller, I really do wonder at your sudden conscientiousness. You have told me falsehoods enough in your time, Heaven knows!"

"Me! I told you falsehoods!" was upon the tip of Joseph's tongue; but suddenly he remembered that often, in the heat of his affection for Lizzy, he had used terms of endearment and admiration that were not warranted by fact. He had, during these fits of temporary insanity, called her his "angel," his "life," his "soul," whereas she was not, and could not be any of these things, but only a pretty, little dumpling of a girl, of whom, however, he was very fond. So the truth-teller was obliged to reply—

"Yes, Lizzy, I have told you falsehoods; but I will do so no more."

"Upon my word!" exclaimed Lizzy, indignantly, "I suppose, when you told me you loved me, you told me a falsehood? Well, I declare!"

"No, Lizzy, that was the truth! I do love you."

"Oh, you do. I should be very thankful for small favors! What do you mean, then, by saying that you have told me falsehoods?"

"I have called you the sweetest darling in the world; and that was false, for you are not such."

"Well, upon my word! Anything else?"

"Yes; I have called you an angel, which of course was not true."

"Humph! what else?"

"A beauty, a seraph, and my life, and my soul; neither of which you are, dear Lizzy'"

"And you told me you should die if I didn't marry you; and I suppose that was as false as the rest?"

"Yes, Lizzy, it was.

"Well, now, after that last speech, I hope you will take your hat and go!"

"No. dear Lizzy, I shall not. And now you must be content to hear the honest truth. Although you are no angel nor beauty, you are a very good looking young girl. And though my life actually does not depend upon your constancy, and though your final rejection of me would not quite kill me, still I do love you very dearly, and should feel very sorry if anything were to happen to part us. I mean to be true to you in word and deed, both as a lover and as a husband," said Joseph, seriously.

"Well, really I ought to feel flattered! You are very sincere now, at least," sneered the girl.

"I was always as sincere as this—that I never meant to deceive you. Those hyperbolical terms of admiration and endearment, though not literally true, were at their worst only the fond exaggerations of a sincere lover," said Joseph, deprecatingly.

"You never were in love with me, or you are not so now, else you would not think that hyper—what's its name—which I suppose means too good for me. No, Mr. Morriss, it is somebody else you love, not me."

Morriss was silent, because he was turning over in his mind a subject that he did not clearly understand—namely, the state of his own heart;—then he replied truthfully—

"No, Lizzy, there is no one in the world I love as much as yourself."

"You say that very slowly and doubtfully; and I see very well how it is. There is some one you admire more than you do me, and whom you could love better than you love me, if you were free to do so. Now isn't that the truth?"

The blood rushed to Joseph's face in a crimson flush and then retreating left it pale as mrrble, as in a low unsteady voice, he replied—

"Lizzy, it you had asked me this question but yesterday, I should have answered 'No,' telling you a pleasant conventional falsehood; but to-day I speak the stern truth, and answer 'Yes.'"

"Then why don't you take your hat and go, as I told you before?" exclaimed the girl, flushed with what we are are forced to admit was a very natural indignation.

"Because, Lizzy, I must first reason with you, and then, perhaps, you will understand me better, and not wish me to go. Listen to me, dear Lizzy, for you are very dear to me; if you were not, I would not tell you so! We human creatures are many of us aspiring beings, Lizzy, and apt to look up to that which is excellent, and sigh for that which is unattainable. Lizzy, from boyhood to manhood, I have watched a lovely little girl grow up into a lovely woman; she is beautiful, without vanity; wise, without pedantry; wealthy, without pride; a perfect woman, Lizzy, if ever one lived in this world——"

"Then you had better go and tell her so, and not stand here insulting me with her praises."

"Bear with me, Lizzy! You asked for the truth, and I am giving it to you. This noble woman is not for me; her brow is destined for a coronet, perhaps! I never lowered her by so familiar a thought as that of making her my wife; and therefore, I never dared to love her——"

"I won't stand this any longer! Why, to think that the very proposal of marriage, that I know you considered quite a compliment to me, you look upon as a degradation if offered to her! No, I won't stand it! Here! take back your pledge, and leave the house, sir!" exclaimed the girl passionately, tearing off her ring and dashing it upon the floor.

"But hear me, Lizzy, and if you understand me, you will see that you have no reasonable cause for jealousy. This noble woman, whom I never, even in imagination, connected with love or marriage, has been to me a guiding star, and has even made me more worthy to become your husband——"

"I don't see it; and I don't thank her!"

"I will explain, and you may thank her! She was an early school-fellow and playmate of mine, and now, notwithstanding her great change of fortune, I believe she takes a friendly interest in my welfare. Therefore, Lizzy, in many an hour of temptation and danger, the thought of her—the thought that she would hear of my weakness and folly—has saved me from sin and misery. There, Lizzy! that is what that woman has done for me, no more, no less! Take back your ring, dear Lizzy, and believe that I will be true to you as long as you accept my fidelity," said Joseph, picking up the pledge, and attempting to replace it upon her finger.

But she slapped his hand off, and threw the ring out of the window, saying—

"No; I wont take any half heart, or any second-handed heart either! You may go to your paragon. I never did think you worth much, and now I know that you are worth nothing! And worthless as you are in everything else, you are not even faithful to me! I never did really love you, and and now I hate and despise you. So now I hope you will go before I call a policeman to put you out!"

This was spoken very passionately, but there was a deep viciousness in Lizzy's looks, as well as a fierce acrimony in her words, that left no saving doubt on Joseph's mind as to her real meaning or her true character. The latter was a revelation to him. He rose with dignity, and said—

"Good-bye, Lizzy! you are not the Lizzy I supposed you to be! I have been as much deceived in you as you profess to have been in me! Thank Heaven the mistake has been discovered in good time. And thank you Lizzy, for my restored freedom. Yes! it is a bitter lesson, but a wholesome one;" and dashing a few indignant tears from his eyes, the young man turned and left the house.

"There! thank fortune, I have got rid of him. Why, now that he is cast off by his uncle, and turned out by his employer, he hasn't even the means of getting his own living! If I were to marry him now, I should have to support him! Let him put up with it! and he admiring another woman more than he does me! And I wonder who she is? However I don't mind. I shall take care to let Mr Henry Blewitt know that the coast is clear now, for he is infinitely the better match of the two!" soliloquised Miss Lizzy, as she seated herself to trim the Parisian bonnet.

Meantime Joseph, brooding over the selfishness, hardness, and duplicity of Lizzy's character, as it had just been revealed to him, wandered thoughtfully away from the milliner's shop. In his deep abstraction, he ran plump up against a gentleman advancing from the other end of the street.

"Hey! what, Joseph! are you really as mad as they say you are, and are you 'running a muck' against all Little Britain?"

"Oh, Blewitt! is that you? I beg your pardon!"

"I should think you might, after knocking the soul out of my body! How do you get on?"

"Get on! I am getting off it appears. Ah, Blewitt! I have not yet told the truth for hours, and I am off with my uncle, off with my employer, and off with my sweetheart!"

"I told you so! and now if you do not look out sharp, in seven more hours you will be off to the lunatic asylum. Your good aunt has been down to your place inquiring after you. The story they told her at Black's you may be certain did not reassure her. She is herself convinced, and has convinced them, that you are entirely out of your head, as she calls it. They are now thoroughly persuaded that your strange conduct this morning was the effect of serious mental derangement. They are all very anxious lest you should do yourself a mischief!"

"And really, I think their anxiety in the last respect well founded! I suppose, in the last seven hours, I have done myself as much mischief as a man possibly could do himself by simply speaking the truth!" said Joseph, dejectedly.

"Shouldn't wonder, my dear fellow. Still the play must be played out. In the meantime, what will you do? All Little Britian is in a stir with the news that you have suddenly gone mad. They are searching for you in every direction to put you under restraint and subject you to a medical examination. Now, as you are bound not to give any explantion of your conduct until the end of the week, you must either get out of the way or into Bedlam."

"I shall take my choice," said Joseph in desperation; "but I have business down at Streatham, I shall go and attend to that first."

"Then you'd better be off at once, my fine fellow; so I will not detain you. Au revior!" said Blewitt, gaily lifting his hat and waving it as they separated.

Joseph Morriss returned to the Angel and Gridiron, refreshed himself with a chop and a glass of ale, took up his parcel, threw himself into a Streatham omnibus, and started for the Rosery, the beautiful suburban villa of Helen Lyle, the wealthy heiress.

"And now, Helen!—gentle-hearted, noble-minded, pure-spirited Helen—will you, too discard your old school-fellow for speaking the truth? Shall you ask me trying questions?—must I answer with offensive truths?—and will you expel me with ignominy from your gates? Heaven forbid," thought Joseph as the omnibus rattled along towards Streatham.

In due time he was set down at the head of a shady lane, whence a short walk took him to the lovely little wooded vale in which was situated the Rosery.

CHAPTER V.

"Ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

Helen Lyle, the wealthy proprietress of the Rosery, was the only daughter of the old schoolmaster from whom Joseph Morriss had received the "rudiments" of his education. As Mr. Lyle's elementary school had been composed of both boys and girls of a tender age, Helen and Joseph had been schoolmates and classmates from the time they were mere infants until the year in which Joseph was received as shop-boy in Black, Brown, White, and Green's establishment, and Helen was promoted to the assistant teacher's desk in her father's school. And after that they were companions and friends, until one quiet autumn afternoon, when the gentle-spirited old master laid down the ferule that he seldom used, dropped his head softly upon his desk, and sank into his last long sleep. After the schoolmaster's death, Helen went out as a daily governess to win her daily bread. And at this thankless task she toiled year after year, until one bitter, bitter winter day, when she returned from her round of duties, chilled, weary, hungry, and faint, to her humble lodgings, she found there a grim visaged lawyer, with a green bag, anxiously waiting her appearance. Helen's great-uncle, her grandfather's elder brother had died in New Orleans, and left her half a million of pounds sterling, made in the cotton-trade.

And Helen Lyle, the poor, overworked, ill-paid, daily governess, was, in point of wealth, a match for a duke—in point of worth, she was matchless.

Helen was now twenty-two years of age, so that there were no tedious days of minority and guardianship to be lingered out. She entered at once upon her splendid fortune, which she enjoyed with the meekness of a gentle spirit, long disciplined by adversity. Love of the country tempted her to leave London, while attachment to her old friends and neighbors withheld her from going far away; so she purchased a villa at Streatham, and invited Mrs. Cassock, a needy relative, the wife of a country curate, to live with her.

Helen furnished her house with elegant simplicity, and adopted a style of living many degrees below that to which her real wealth entitled her. This was done in consideration of those old and humble friends and neighbors, to whom she was tenderly attached, whom she constantly invited and entertained at her villa, and whom she did not wish to repel by a show of great disparity in their mutual way of living. The surplus income saved in this manner was devoted to the purposes of charity.

It was quite in vain that ladies of the upper classes, who had younger sons to dispose of, or younger brothers to provide for condescended to "take up" this wealthy City heiress, and endeavored to patronize this parvenue. Helen had too much gentle dignity of character to have accepted the mere patronage of a Royal duchess. She was perfectly inaccessible, except through her affections or her conscience.

Helen had been in possession of her fortune three years, and was consequently now twenty-five years of age.

HER ANCESTRAL COW BELL.

Its Sound is the Signal for a Sylvan Vision.

The visitor was in the land of dreams, when she heard a tinkle, tinkle that only half woke her. She closed her eyes again and dreamed of a green meadow, a winding brook and a herd of cattle feeding. The leader wore a bell that tinkled when she moved her head. It was a pleasant dream to have on a chilly November morning in a flat not ten feet from a noisy elevated railway.

Soon a rap on the door effectually aroused the sleeper, whose mind dwelt on her dream as she made her toilet.

At the breakfast table she told her hostess about it. A smile passed between her and her husband, and the lady said: "Jack said you wouldn't hear the bell, but you must have heard it, since you wove it into your dreams. My dear, it was my ancestral cow bell,' as Jack calls it, that brought up all that sylvan scenery.

"I found it when I was back at the old farm last Summer, and I said to myself: 'This shall be my dinner bell.' So I scoured it up, and it has a place of honor on the buffet. Four times each day the tocsin sounds, and every time I hear it I think of the old Brindle and everything else belonging to the dear old farm. Jack laughs at my sentiment, but I wouldn't exchange my cowbell for the finest silver bell that money could buy."

Preparing Potatoes.

There are a great many kitchens that are not possessed of the luxury of a brush for cleaning potatoes. It is next to impossible to wash potatoes perfectly clean by hand. The use of a little scrubbing brush, such as may be purchased at from five to ten cents, will soon make their jackets fresh and clean, so that they will be fit to be brought on the table roasted. Roast potatoes should always have a little bit of skin chipped off at either end to allow the steam to escape and to prevent their becoming sodden before they are thoroughly done. Such a brush is also very useful in washing beets and various other root vegetables, all of which are probably just as well cooked in their skins and peeled when done—the turnip being the only exception to this rule, as it acquires a bitter flavor when boiled in its jacket.—Chicago Herald.

Did Seem Strange.

Public Library Attendant, after a brief visit behind the bookshelves—"None of the numbers you've marked on this list are in just now."

Man Outside the Railing—"I hardly expected they would be. There are numbers of fourteen books on this slip. They all treat of the condition of agriculture in Ireland in the seventeenth century. How do you account for the unanimous, spontaneous, and feverish demand on the part of the reading public for information as to the condition of agriculture in Ireland in the seven——"

Attendant, exceedingly red in the face—"Next!"

A MOUND BUILDERS' IDOL.

The State Historical Society was enriched by an image of pottery supposed to be an idol of some prehistoric race, probable the Mound Builders.

The idol was found near Aron, Independence County, Ark., and was dug from a mound by relic hunters along with a number of decayed human bones, copper arrow heads and broken domestic utensils. It is the property of G. W. Hume, of Strasburg, Mo.

The idol is seven inches in height by five inches in diameter. It is rudely constructed having evidently been formed by hand, or at best very crude tools, from common clay, and afterward hardened by being dried in the sun.

The idol represents a human figure in a kneeling posture, the arms extending at the side. The features are rudely formed, yet notwithstanding this are not altogether repulsive, the nose being gracefully acquiline and the lips well formed. The ears are missing, but the remnants show that they were adorned with rings. The body is "squatty" and might be said to resemble a toad. At the top of the head there is a hole which seems to have served a purpose, probably that of fastening a head dress to the figure. The image would hardly be catalogued with the works of art; but it is nevertheless an interesting relic.

The race, whose diety was represented by this clumsy bit of clay, inhabited the Mississippi Valley from the Great Lakes to the Gulf at a time to which the traditions of man runneth not. Who they were, where they came from, what their manner of life was, is all a mystery. True, many mounds, excavations, and burying grounds of this lost people have been discovered, but so far they have given but little of their history. That they lived and died before the race of American Indians existed is proven by the fact that the traditions of the latter race contain no references to this lost people, although their mounds and relics are mentioned. Many mounds of this kind are found in Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, and Indiana, and a few have been discovered in nearly all of the States in the Mississippi Valley.—Topeka Capital.

A VACANT SEAT.

How Two Dear Creatures Show Their Unselfishness.

There was just one vacant seat in the street car and two women came hurrying and bustling in together and stood before the unoccupied seat.

"You sit down," said one of the ladies generously, waving her hand toward the seat.

"Oh, no; you take it."

"No, I'd rather stand."

"So would I."

"Oh, take it. I've been sitting nearly all day."

"So have I."

"But I really don't care to sit."

"But I don't mind standing in the least!"

"Neither do I. Indeed, I often prefer to stand."

"But you look tired."

"Oh, I'm not a bit. Now you sit down."

"No, you."

"No, no, you, I get off first."

"Then you ought to take the seat now and I'll take the seat afterward."

"But I really don't care for it."

"Neither do I."

"Please take it."

This goes on until both women try to sit down at the same time and one of them sits in the lap of the weary looking young man who jumps up and goes out and stands on the platform, thus making room for both women and the tormenting dialogue comes to an end.—Detroit Free Press.

HOW IT ENDED.

Horace Would Give Madeline Only the One Chance.

"Madeline, will you marry me?"

His voice had a husky, appealing sound, his heart thumped audibly, and his knees had got beyond his control.

"No, Horace I will not."

"This—this is your final answer, is it Madeline?"

"It is, Horace. I am sorry I cannot——"

"This is the end of all my fond hopes, the waking from the dream I have been dreaming, and the winding up of the fool's paradise in which I have dwelt for the last three months, is it?"

"I—I suppose it is, Horace, but do not be utterly cast down," said the young woman, soothingly. "Time softens all our griefs and turns sorrow into joy. In the future, Horace, when the pain of this refusal shall have——"

"Miss Shuckers," he exclaimed, rising with dignity, as became a man who had received a temporary backset, but had recovered himself, "talk not to me of the future. It may have its consolations, its joys and its repose, but it can not re-awaken old delusions. Henceforth, Miss Shuckers," he added reaching for his hat and cane and moving with unruffled self-possession toward the door, "I can never be anything more to you than a brother."—Chicago Tribune.

He Set His Teeth and Did It.

Dr. Savage, of the American Bible Society, was, during the late war, a strong Union man.

Just after the battle of Perryville, in October, 1862, Dr. Savage was at one of his appointments to baptize some children. There was a large crowd, and a sturdy Southern matron brought her four children to the altar. "Name this child," said the Union preacher, laying his hand on the boy's head. "Simon Bolivar Buckner," was the reply, which caused a smile to come over the congregation, but the brave preacher went on with his duty.

"Name this child," taking the next in order. "Pierre Gustave Toutant Beauregard," and the smile grew into a snigger, while Dr. Savage became red in the face. He baptized the young namesake of the great engineer-soldier and went on with the ceremony. "Name this child," he gasped, reaching for the third. "Albert Sydney Johnston," came the answer. The smile became audible and the preacher apoplectic.

Heaving a sigh of relief he took the fourth child, a little girl, whose gender he fondly supposed would preclude a continuation of heroic reproduction, and said: "Name this child." "Mary Stonewall Jackson Lee," came a response that set the congregation in a roar, while the Union parson thought he had held in his arms the whole Southern Confederacy.—St. Louis Republic.

Went by Contraries.

A smart little woman got into the street car the other day with a baby in her arms, says the Arkansaw Traveler. It lay as still as a lamb. Soon however, it changed its course.

It began a loud tune. The mother took the baby and stood it straight up in her lap. It yelled just the same. She hugged it too her bosom. It yelled right along. She stroked it and soothed it. Still louder yells. She boxed its ears. Prolonged and spasmodic yells.

She then changed her plans. She cleared a space all around, set the baby down, loosened the bands about neck, gave it plenty of room and then said, in her most persuasive tone:

"Now, dearie, let it go as loud as you can."

Baby never uttered a sound.

"I thought you wouldn't,' she said. She took it up in her lap, the gentlemen resumed their seats and the car trundled on.

AT LAST IT IS ENDED

The Trouble Between the United States and Chile a Matter of History.

Another Message From the President Announcing That Chile Had Come to Time.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29.—The following is the president's message transmitting the additional Chilean correspondence to congress:

Washington, Jan. 28.—To the senate and House of Representatives: I transmit herewith additional correspondence between this government and the government of Chile, consisting of a note of Mr. Montt, the Chilean minister at this capital, to Mr. Blaine, date Jan. 23, a reply of Mr. Blaine thereto, of date Jan. 27, and a dispatch from Mr. Egan, our minister at Santiago, transmitting the response of Mr. Pereira, the Chilean minister of foreign affairs, to the note of Mr. Blaine of Jan. 21, which was received by me on the 26th inst. The note of Mr. Montt to Mr. Blaine, though dated Jan. 23, was not delivered at the state department until after 12 o'clock meridian of the 25th, and was not translated and its receipt notified to me until late in the afternoon of that day.

The response of Mr. Pereira to our note of the 21st, withdraws, with acceptable expressions of regret, the offensive note of Mr. Matta, of the 11th ult., and also the request for the recall of Mr. Egan. The treatment of the incident of the assault upon the sailors of the Baltimore is so conciliatory and friendly that I am of the opinion that there is a good prospect that the differences growing out of that serious affair can now be adjusted upon terms satisfactory to this government by the usual methods and without special powers from congress. This turn in the affairs is very gratifying to me, as I am sure it will be to the congress and to our people. The general support of the efforts of the executive to enforce the just right of the nation in this matter, has given an instructive and useful illustration of the unity and patriotism of our people. Should it be necessary, I will again communicate with congress upon the subject.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

CHILE'S APOLOGY.

The Little Republic Comes Off the Perch Very Gracefully.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28.—The reply to Secretary Blaine's ultimatum of Jan. 22 was received from Senor Pereira, minister of foreign affairs, under date of Jan. 25, but was not received in Washington until the following day. The note is as follows:

The undersigned has had the honor to receive your excellency's communication, dated the 22d inst., received in this department the 23d, and the duly authenticated copies of the instructions which the honorable secretary of state at Washington has sent to your excellency by cable under dates of the 21st inst. and the 23d of October, 1891. In the instructions of the 21st inst. the honorable secretary of state informs your excellency, Mr. Harrison, after carefully examining all that has been submitted to him by the government of Chile, with respect to the event which occurred at Valparaiso on the evening of the 16th of October, and taking into consideration the testimony of the officers and crew of the vessel, the Baltimore, and of others who witnessed the event, has arrived at the MINISTER EGAN.

FOLLOWING CONCLUSIONS.

First—That with regard to that assault there has been no change whatever made in the character given to it by the first reports of that event, to wit; that it was an attack upon the uniform of the navy of the United States, which had its origin and motive in a feeling of hostility toward the government, and not in any act of the individual sailors belonging to it.

Second—That the public authorities of Valparaiso evidently did not do their duty in protecting these sailors, and that a part of the police and some Chilean soldiers and sailors rendered themselves guilty of unprovoked assaults on the sailors of the United States before and after the latter were arrested, and that he believes that Riggin was killed by the police or the soldiers; and Third—That he is consequently compelled to carry the question back to the state in which it was placed by the note of the Hon. Mr. Wharton, dated Oct. 23, and to ask for suitable satisfaction and some adequate reparation for the injury done the government of the United States.

The honorable secretary of state, Mr. Blaine, regrets that the government of Chile has not from the very first appreciated the gravity of the question raised, and that it has attributed to it no other importance than that of an ordinary quarrel between sailors, adding that no government which respects itself can consent to civil or military persons employed in its service being maltreated or killed in a foreign territory on account of resentment, for acts which it may have committed, or which may be imputed to it, without REQUIRING ADEQUATE REPARATION.

The Hon. Mr. Blaine in this connection recalls the fact that the government of the United States has voluntarily recognized this principle and has acted accordingly when any injury has been committed by its people against any one holding an official position in a foreign country in consequence of acts which had aroused resentment. In such cases the United States has never sought words of little weight or ambiguous meaning in order to make reparation, but has condemned such acts in vigorous and energetic terms, and has never refused to give other adequate satisfaction. The honorable secretary of state, Mr. Blaine, states, moreover, that it is not his intention to discuss the details of the incident of October, but only to set forth the conclusions at which his government has arrived. The honorable secretary of state says: "We have given every kind of opportunity to the government of Chile to offer explanatory or extenuating circumstances, and we have given due consideration to the fact that the government of Chile, during a great part of the time which elapsed since the 16th of October, has been in a provisional situation."

He then adds that he is directed by his excellency, Mr. Harrison, to say that he has been compelled to take notice of the instruction as sent by Mr. Matta, minister of foreign affairs, to the Chilean minister in Washington, under date of Dec. 11, because, although they were not officially communicated to this government, they received the greatest possible publicity, and that, consequently, he demands the immediate withdrawal of the said instructions as to those parts which he considers offensive, and adequate satisfaction, in order that the diplomatic relations between the two nations

MAY NOT BE INTERRUPTED.

Without any intention of opening a discussion as to the facts referred to by the communication which I have extracted, and confining himself to the first part of the instructions of the honorable secretary of state, the undersigned must state to your excellency the regret with which the government of Chile sees that his excellency, the president of the United States, finds reason to continue to regard the incident of October as an attack caused by a hostile feeling towards the uniform of the navy of the United States. That unfortunate occurrence took place on a sudden in a district where the sailors of the vessels lying in the Bay of Valparaiso are in the habit of assembling without distinction of nationality. From the nature of the incident it would be impossible to prove that there was no doubt as to the special cause which served as its origin or pretext. But the undersigned can assert that that cause was not a hostile feeling toward the uniform of the navy of the United States, because the people of Chile have always esteemed and respected that uniform ever since the time it saw it figuring honorably in the ranks of soldiers and sailors who, in a great struggle, gave it independence and established the republic. The undersigned admits that the occurrence of Oct. 16 was of greater gravity than those which usually occur in the same district between the sailors who frequent it, and the fact of knowing that two deaths have occurred from it among the sixteen wounded men of the Baltimore has sufficed to give an extraordinary character, and to induce the government of Chile to hasten to adopt the measures necessary to discover and punish the guilty parties, and in due time, if there should be ground for so doing,

TO OFFER SUCH REPARATION

as might be due. The preliminary examination was commenced on the morning which followed the night of the conflict, some days before you presented your complaint. But the investigation could not be finished with the rapidity which the government of Chile desired, because the rules of procedure in criminal matters, which are established by our laws, are of slow application, and it was not possible for the president of the republic to modify or set them aside. This delay, which was inevitable owing to the independence with which the judicial authorities must act, has compelled the government of the undersigned to delay, greatly to its regret, the settlement of the difficulty pending with your government, and a spontaneous offer of reparation for any injury done to the sailors of the Baltimore, and that might be attributed to Chilean soldiers or sailors, or that might affect the responsibility of Chile in view of your communication, and considering that up to date it has been impossible for the trial initiated by the judges of the criminal court of Valparaiso to be decided, the undersigned regards it as his duty to declare once more that the government of Chile laments the occurrence of Oct. 16, and, by way of showing the sincerity of his feelings and the confidence he has in the justice of his cause, he declares his willingness to await the decision of the examining judge, and proposes to the United States government that the case be submitted to the consideration of the supreme court of justice at Washington, to the end that that tribunal, with its learning and impartiality, may determine, without appeal, whether there is any ground for reparation, and in what shape it should be made. The undersigned would remit you, referring to the conduct of the Valparaiso authorities, that it appears from the preliminary examination that they sent without delay to the scene of the conflict all the forces at their disposal belonging to the special guard of the intendencia and to the police, Swanson, Cox, Nichols, Darony, Hondes, Cunningham, Williams, Talbot, Hollard, Hodge, Butler, etc., seamen belonging to the crew of the Baltimore, stated to the interpreter of that vessel that the object of the police in arresting them was to shelter them from any attempt at attack

BY THE EXCITED PEOPLE.

The undersigned thinks that the action of the police in this matter should be considered with a due allowance for the civil war which had recently been brought to a close. The body was not yet properly organized, nor did it have the force that was required to put down a disorder of such proportions in a short time.

In this connection it is proper to recall the words used by the honorable secretary of state at Washington in his note addressed to the Marquis Imperiali and bearing date of May 21, 1891: "There is no government, however civilized it may be, however great may be the vigilance displayed by its police, and however severe its criminal code may be, and however speedy and inflexible may be its administration of justice, that can guarantee its own citizens against violence growing out of individual malice or a sudden popular tumult."

This was precisely the situation of the administrative authorities at Valparaiso on the occasion of the occurrence which took place in October.

The undersigned hopes that the foregoing will convince the honorable secretary of state that the government of Chile attaches due importance to the question now under discussion. That he does not for a moment hesitate to the act committed on the 16th of October, or to offer such reparation as is just, and that he has not neglect the opportunity to express these sentiments before now, since, on various occasions and through the present plenipotentiaries of both countries, he has forwarded explicit declarations on the subject to Washington. The undersigned takes the liberty to recall the fact that five days after he had taken charge of the department of foreign relations he addressed to the minister of Chile in the United States a telegram which, in the part relating to this matter, says:

"Express to the United States government what has already been stated, adding all the data that are known in the most correct and amicable form. Express to the United States government very sincere regret on account of this unfortunate incident, which, although not strange in the ports of the world, this government doubly laments owing to its sincere desire to cultivate friendship with the United States."

If the United States government should not accept the foregoing explanations as satisfactory, notwithstanding that the judicial authorities hold the guilty parties responsible for the disorder of Oct. 16, the undersigned must recall the circumstance that the government of Chile, through the medium of its minister in Washington, has expressed the desire to submit any misunderstanding to decision by arbitration by any power or tribunal which may be indicated to it; and, in fact, arbitration was suggested in conference with the minister of Chile in Washington on the 30th of December. There is, therefore, submitted to the honorable secretary of state of the department of foreign relations at Washington the designation of either the supreme court of justice of the United States or a tribunal of arbitration to determine the reparation which Chile may have to make for that lamentable occurrence.

THE MATTA LETTER.

As for the dispatch addressed under date of Dec. 11 to the Chilean minister in Washington by the minister of foreign relations of the provisional government, the undersigned declares that there could not be on the part of the government of Chile the purpose to inflict any offense upon the government of the United States with which it desires to maintain the most friendly relations. Consequently the undersigned deplores that in the telegram there were employed through error of judgment the expressions which are offensive in the judgment of your government, declaring in fulfillment of a high duty, courtesy and sincerity toward a friendly nation, that the government of Chile absolutely withdraws the said expressions, the undersigned trusts that this frank and explicit declaration, which confirms that which had already been made to the honorable secretary of state in Washington will carry to the mind of his excellency, Mr. Harrison, of his government, that the people of Chile, far from entertaining a feeling of hostility, have the lively desire to maintain unalterable the good and cordial relations which up to the present time exist between the two countries, a declaration which is made without reservation, in order that it may receive such publicity as your government may deem suitable.

With regard to the suggestion made touching the change of the personnel of your legation to which the instructions of the honorable secretary of state refers it is incumbent upon the undersigned to declare that the government of Chile will take no positive step without the accord of the government of the United States, with which it desires to maintain itself in friendly understanding. The undersigned brings this already long communication to a close in the assurance that he has therein set forth everything that can fully satisfy your government. The government of Chile cherishes the conviction that the relations with the government of the United States should be sincerely and cordially maintained under the shelter of the mutual respect, and that good understanding which are based upon the just and equitable appreciation of the facts and in the appreciation to be given to the spontaneous declarations made on either side. The undersigned, moreover, declares that in presenting its explanation his government finds its inspiration in the words of the instructions which you have quoted and which you assure the government of Chile that the president is not disposed to exact of any nation which your government would not under the same circumstances spontaneously concede.

HUSTLERS FOR NEWS.

An Incident Showing the Value of Press Associations.

NEW YORK, Jan. 28.—It is worthy of note that the dispatches of the Associated Press from its special correspondent at Santiago, Chile, the last few days have anticipated all other intelligence from that capital.

Thus on Saturday night the Associated Press dispatch gave the first conclusive statement that an ultimatum had been sent to Chile; on Sunday night the Associated Press dispatch gave the first intimation that Chile would promptly reply to Mr. Blaine's note, and on Monday night the Associated Press correspondent cabled a correct synopsis of Chile's reply. No other news association had this news until it was in print in Associated Press papers.

The United States government itself received its first intimation of the nature of Chile's reply from the Associated Press dispatch. The opposition news association simply appropriated. The Associated Press is universally recognized as the medium for reaching the American public, and when news of prime importance is to be had it secures this first of all.

CONDENSED TELEGRAMS.

Prince Iturbide of Mexico has decided to postpone his marriage with the daughter of Senator Stanford of California owing to his mother's recent death.

Edward F. Fitzsimmons, the murderer of Detective Gilkeson, and who afterwards escaped from jail in Pittsburg last fall, has been captured in New Orleans.

CRUELTY TO SOLDIERS.

Many Cases of Brutal Treatment in the German Army.

BERLIN, Feb. 2.—The socialist journal Vorwarts to-day publishes a copy of an order issued to the Twelfth army corps by Prince George of Saxony, calling upon the officers to put a stop to the inhuman treatment of the men by non-commissioned officers, the prince adding that socialism, which is a public danger to Germany, will only be strengthened by such treatment.

The order instances nine specific cases of cruelty. In one case a sergeant named Zwahr exercised his men during meal times and sleeping hours until they were half-dead with fatigue. In some primitive drills the men were compelled to present arms 500 times. In one case a recruit was obliged to raise and lower a can of boiling coffee until he became so exhausted that he allowed the can's contents to stream over his head and shoulders.

In another case a sergeant named Fennig habitually kicked his men and struck them with a belt, wantonly forced them to perform nauseating tasks and tortured them until they screamed with agony. A sergeant named Weise thrashed a man with a belt until his arm ached so that he was unable to continue the flogging, and he injured another man internally by kicking and flogging him. Other cases are instanced where men were paraded and drilled at midnight in the depth of winter—wearing only their shirts—until they fainted. In addition, many cases of blackmailing are mentioned. The guilty sergeants have been sentenced to imprisonment for from two to five years each.

The revelation of these cruelties has caused much indignation among the public.

TROUBLE IN A TRUST.

Strong Opposition to President Greenhut, of the Whisky Combine.

CHICAGO, Feb. 2.—J. B. Greenhut has offered to resign the presidency of the Cattle Feeding and Distilling company.

This is positively stated by certain directors of the whisky trust who are at the Auditorium to attend to-morrow's meeting of the board. They further state that this offer was not accepted, but that this fact does not mean that harmony has been restored. On the contrary there was every indication to-night that to-morrow would witness the stormiest gatherings the directory has ever known.

Those who constitute the opposition to President Greenhut declare that they own 70 per cent of the stock and that there is no reason except baseless bear movements why there should be any decrease of confidence on the part of the stockholders. The company, they say, was never more prosperous, its profits being over $10,000 a day.

Against the talk of the opposition that President Greenhut's call for the meeting to-morrow is merely a bluff, explicit statements were made to-night by other directors that unless vital concessions are made to-morrow by the men who confess that they hold 70 per cent of the stock, not only President Greenhut but his friends will withdraw.

BUCKED BY BUFFALO.

An Unavailing Effort to Shut Out Mr. Thompson of Duluth.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 2.—Secretary Thompson, of the Duluth chamber of commerce, had a hearing to-day before the house committee of railways and canals in advocacy of the proposition to secure a canal around Niagara falls and looking for deep-water communications between the great lakes and the Atlantic coast on American soil. The committee received his remarks with a great deal of attention.

The Buffalo interest and all the interests which it controls are very much in favor of deep water on the lakes connecting all the lakes as far as Niagara Falls, but at the same time are fighting every proposition looking to the building of a canal or other means of waterway to the Hudson river and thence to the seaboard. They tried in every way to prevent Mr. Thompson from presenting his claims before the committee on rivers and harbors for this project, holding that it was a matter which should come before the committee on railways and canals in the house; but the votes of the delegates representing the deep-water ways convention, Thompson was instructed to present his arguments. He says it is not yet sure whether the rivers and harbors committee can be induced to take any action upon the proposition of the survey or not, but he hopes to see it inserted in the river and harbor bill.

THE BERING SEA DISPUTE.

At Last the Final Settlement of the Controversy Seems in Sight.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British minister, called at the state department to-day in company with British Bering Sea Commissioners Sir George Baden-Powell and Mr. Dawson. They had a conference with Mr. Blaine, and arranged preliminaries of the joint conference to be held between the United States and Great Britain by the commissioners who visited Bering sea last summer for the special purpose of investigating the seal industry.

Sir George Baden-Powell said to a reporter that he and his colleague had come here prepared to settle all questions of difference. He believed that a conclusion would be reached honorable and satisfactory to the United States and Great Britain. State department officials and public men generally here feel somewhat encouraged now that the British commissioners are here and ready to begin work, over the prospect of a final settlement of this long standing and vexatious dispute. No one looks for a speedy conclusion, but the spirit in which the commissioners on both sides begin their work leads officials here to look for a satisfactory agreement, such as is predicted by Sir George Baden-Powell.

A sleighing party of young folks of Red Lake Falls was here last Sunday evening for a couple of hours.

A number of young folks enjoyed a pleasant dance at Dainard's Hall last Saturday evening.

The fine weather the past week has been hard on the sleighing and the road is getting bare in many places.

The all-absorbing topic of conversation at present is—what was the matter of Jim Dainard at the dance last Saturday night.

An even dozen of traveling men came up on todays train which would indicate that our merchants are doing considerable business.

John Eikhof, of Grand Forks, is in town this week visiting his brother Fred Eikhof, and renewing acquaintance with many old friends.

The regular monthly meeting of the village council was held last Monday evening. Very little business was before the meeting.

The Minnesota State Editorial Association will hold their annual meeting at St. Paul next Wednesday. An extensive programme has been prepared as it is twenty five years since the association was organized.

Dr. H. Grundy, of Toronto Can., arrived last week and determined to locate at Thief River Falls, Dr. Grundy comes well recommended and appears to be a well informed man, Look over his card which appears in this issue.

A large amount of wheat in the country that has been threshed since the snow came is in an unmarketable condition. When it was threshed it was full of snow and ice which has since melted leaving the wheat damp and tough. Farmers will do well to dry it as much as possible before marketing.

Yesterday was the day the ground hog or woodchuck, so tradition says, comes out of his hole for the first time during the winter and looks the weather over. If he can see his shadow he retires expecting six weeks cold weather but if the day is cloudy the weather will be mild. If our ground hogs are thrifty and got up before noon yesterday he undoubtedly saw his shadow, but if he was slow about coming out he did not, as the afternoon was cloudy.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY Will be celebrated at Red Lake Falls. Their new orchestra, composed of six members, will give their opening ball in the evening at Opera Hall, with supper at 12 o'clock. St. Hilaire young people are invited, with assurance of an enjoyable time and a cordial reception.

An Ohio man insists that a sure cure for the grip is to roll over in the snow in the back yard in Adamic costume. That may do in Ohio, but in this mild climate the snow is not reliable. In an early period that experiment was kept up for a time in the severest weather of New England by some of the merry young men. It required a good deal of activity to make it prudent but it would have cured the grip without doubt had there been any about.—Globe,

This month will, undoubtedly, prove the coldest January on record since 1885. The temperature has been below zero during most all of the month. We are beginning to suspect that Kellogg, the blind St. Paul weather prophet who has proved himself such an expert guesser the past few years, will make another great hit this winter. About Christmas he predicted that January would be a very cold month, though not stormy and that after February 1st fine weather would prevail followed by very early spring,—Fertile Journal.

The tread power threshing machines bid fair to become popular with the farmers. The tread power machine is worked by three horses and oxen with five or six men and costs about $400 to $600 and threshes from 300 to 400 bushels a day. For small farmers an outfit of this kind is badly needed in every part of the state and the probabilities are that a good many machines will be in operation next year. The expenses of boarding from 20 to 26 men, the difficulties in getting crews together and the greatest trouble of keeping them sober in bad weather and on Sunday will be avoided by the substitution of the tread power thresher.—Ada Index.

The United States Navy Revival attracts no little attention in Europe and especially in England. The St. James Gazette of London says "the Americans are making a steady and surprising progress towards becoming a great naval power." English experts are comparing the New York with the Blenheim and the Blake and some of them admit that the former can steam faster and throw more metal than any British vessel of the same class. This however, is not the only time our naval achievements have surprised our English cousins.

St. Paul Dispatch: The howl has come, At last open rebellion has broken out in the ranks of the New York democracy. The mandates of the machine have evoked a most vigerous protest, Hill has hitherto had everything his own way but the Cleveland forces have come to the conclusion that it is time to call a halt, Unchecked progress has increased the insolence and arrogance of the crowd that has been running the machine to such an extent as to be longer unbearable. The last straw, the one that broke the camel's back, was the action of Tammany in calling the state convention for the selection of national delegates to meet Feb. 22. Only one reason is assignable for this hasty proceedure—the preconceived intention to make the delegation a Hill one. Upon this this rock the split has occurred, and the indications are that it will be a serious one,

The final estimates of the cereals crops of this country in 1891, by the experianced statistician of the Department of Agriculture show that the most sanguine expectations of magnificent crops have been more than realised. The wheat crop is the largest ever grown in this country and the yield per acre is the largest ever reported by the Department of Agriculture. The area cultivated in wheat was 39,916,897 acres; product, 611,780,000 bushels; value $513,472,711. This is at the rate of nearly 15 bushels per acre and nearly 84 cents per bushel.

The total yield of corn has been exceeded once in our experiance. The area was 76,204,515 acres: the product 2,060,154,000 bushels; value $836,439,328 This is an average of a little more than 27 bushels per acre at 40.6 cents per bushel. The area in oats was 25,581,861 acres product. 738,394,000 bushels; value $232,312,267. This is over 28 bushels per acre and at the rate of 31,46 cents per bushel,

The wheat crop would afford 9.4 bushels to every man woman and child within our limits, a much larger amount than our population could possibly consume, hence we have a year of plenty, of abundance and no person within our borders able and willing to labor should go hungry and there is enough benevolence in the hearts of our people to provide food for those unable to provide it for themselves.

Since Dec. 22, 3,000 mineral leases have been taken out at the office of the state auditor, and the good work of prospecting the comparitively undeveloped northern part of the state goes on with increased vigor. One firm alone has during the period taken out sixty leases and during the past week has had a man busily engaged in the state auditor's office attending to the necessary details The fact that yesterday alone twenty-two applications for leases were filed will tend to show the unusual activity and in most cases they called for the full amount allowed by law—160 acres. In many cases where industrious prospecting has been done the results have made it possible for the lessee to sell th instrument which cost him but $25 for many thousands and this possibility is no doubt inspiring the organization of a host of companies which may add materially to their wealth and that of the state.—Pioneer Press.

St. Paul Globe: It has been one of the puzzles why Senator Stanford, the great railroad magnate, who is indebted to government aid to railroads and land grants chiefly for his millions, should be found in line with Peffers and Donnellys in urging visionary schemes in finance. He is pressing in the senate his bill to authorize the government to issue $100,000,000, or more, as needed, to owners of agricultural lands at 2 per cent interest up to half the value of the lands as assessed. While the bill was under discussion last week the senator was interrogated as to whether the railroads that hold lands under government grants could not also come in for the loan at 2 percent to half the value of their lands. The reply was unhesitating that the roads could so borrow. The men who have been shouting for this policy from the haystacks and grain fields, like Donnelly, Peffer, Simpson and others, are not classed as workers for the railroad kings and monopolists, but in case of success may be entitled to the gratitude that finds expression in free transportation, It would be extremely convenient for the men who are interested in the large tracts of land given away by the government to be able to borrow money on them at 2 per cent. Stanford may not be so luny as he seems in this matter.

HE KNEW IT ALL.

He Had Some Valuable Ideas on the Management of Children.

She said that she was utterly worn out when he asked her how she was feeling; that that boy was enough to drive a saint distracted, and that she didn't know what she could do to make him obey.

He said that the boy was not quite three years old and ought to be easily managed. It was his opinion that she had not sufficient firmness; that she gave in too easily when the boy began to cry.

And then and there he undertook to give her a lesson in the handling of children.

Willie was in his high chair at the table and Willie wanted something. Willie was informed that he could not have it and Willie began to yell. The father immediately became stern.

"Stop that, Willie!" he said sharply; but Willie did not stop.

"Stop that or you'll have to leave the table!" he exclaimed. Still Willie did not stop.

"Now, I presume you would give in," he said to his wife, "but that isn't my way. We'll fight it right out on this line, and the next time I speak he'll know that I mean business."

She said nothing, and he got up, took Willie out of his high chair and put him down on the floor.

"When you stop crying," he said severely, "I'll put you back in your chair."

But Willie kept right on; in fact, he yelled louder than ever.

"Willie," said his father at last, "if you don't stop that you'll have to leave the room. I suppose you think that's cruel, Jane," he added, "but if we fight it out now we'll have no further trouble. It's the only way."

She made no reply, and he again got up and carried the struggling, screaming Willie into another room.

"When you can be quiet, Willie, you may come back," he said.

It was five or ten minutes later that he looked up from his after dinner coffee and asked:

"Do you suppose the boy will make himself sick by his crying?"

She shook her head.

He stood it for a few minutes longer and then he gave in.

"Perhaps, Mrs. Brinker!" he exclaimed as he opened the door and brought the boy back, "perhaps you are heartless enough to let your son cry himself into a fit. Perhaps you have no nerves to be unstrung by such infernal yelling—Hush, Willie, it's all right now—but I am built on a different plan, Mrs. Brinker; on an entirely different plan—shut up, you imp!"

"But a little firmness, James"——

"Mrs. Brinker!"

"If you fight it out once, you know"——

He put Willie down on her lap, grabbed his hat and started out, and as he was closing the front door he heard her call softly after him:

"Whenever you have any valuable ideas on the management of children, James"——

Then he slammed the door. If he had waited he would have found that she had Willie quiet in five minutes and asleep in ten.—Chicago Tribune.

She Was Confident.

Young Wife (gloomily)—Do you suppose our husbands really went fishing last Saturday?

Second Young Wife (confidentially)—I am sure of it.

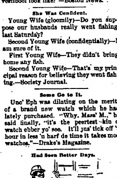
First Young Wife—They didn't bring home any fish.

Second Young Wife—That's my principal reason for believing they went fishing.—Society Journal.

Some Go to It.

Unc' Eph was dilating on the merits of a brand new watch which he had lately purchased. "Why, Mass' M.," he said finally, "it's the peertest kin o' watch ebber yo' see. It'll jus' tick off 'n hour in less 'n harf de time it takes mos' watches."—Drake's Magazine.

Had Seen Better Days.



Mr. Sellit—Well, Uncle Eph, how are you gettin along these days?

Uncle Eph—Oh, I'm gettin along fine. It's a mighty poor day I don't make my two or three dollars.

Mr. Sellit—You must be gettin rich. S'pose you pay me that little bill you owe me.

Uncle Eph—Well, you'll have to 'scuse me today, Mr. Sellit. You see I've been havin a lot of mighty poor days lately.—Harper's Bazar.

Mutually Satisfied.

At the Grand Central depot the other day a woman with a year old baby in her lap said to a man with a satchel who sat next to her:

"I expected a friend, but she has not come. I want to buy my ticket for New Haven, but I can't take the baby into that jam of people. Can I ask you to hold her for two or three minutes?"

"Ma'am, I had a baby left on my hands once in this very way," he replied. "Give me the money and I'll buy your ticket."

"But what guarantee have I got that you won't run off with the money?" she asked.

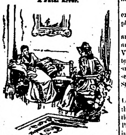
"That's so. You may leave the baby on my hands or I may slide out with the price of your ticket. Seems to be a fix."

"I'll tell you how we can arrange it," said the woman after a moment's thought.

"We'll go together. You bring the baby and I'll buy the ticket. We can thus watch each other."

He agreed, and they lined up before the ticket window. She got her ticket and the baby was duly handed over on the other side of the window.—New York Evening World.

A Fatal Error.



Helen Troy—How has your book on cooking been received?

"Keep it in your pocket."

"Won't have it."

"And calls for ninety-five changes of costume."

"I'll take it."—New York Weekly.

Senator Frye's Warlike Grandson.

Senator Frye has a nine-year-old grandson, whose nature is rather that of a fighter, as his younger brother can testify. The small boy lives in Lewiston, Me., and recently wrote a letter to his grandfather, which may deter Chili from further insults. The letter reads as follows:

> DEAR GRANDPER—I see by the paper that there is going to be a war with the Chilis. And I want to go. papa says I can go if you would find me a place in the gunboats. If you can I should like to be errand boy for the captaion but if you could not get that, I want to be on the commanders or captaions boat.

"Stop huntin an go fishin."—New York Weekly.

Reasons of His Own.

Clubberly—Say, old man, take me around and introduce me to your tailor.

Travers—If it's all the same to you, I would rather not.

Clubberly (heatedly)—What do you mean? Don't you suppose I'm good?

Travers—I don't doubt your being good, but let me give you a letter to him. I don't want to see him personally.—Clothier and Furnisher.

The Thinning of the Thatch.

Oh, the autumn leaves are falling, and the days are closing in,
And the breeze is growing chilly, and my hair is getting thin!
I've a comfortable income—and my age is thirty-three;
But my thatch is thinning quickly—yes, as quickly as can be!

I was once a merry urchin—curly headed I was called—
And I laughed at good old people when I saw them going bald;
But it's not a proper subject to be lightly joked about,
For it's dreadful to discover that your roof is wearing out!

I remember asking uncle—in my innocent surprise—
How he liked his head made use of as a skating rink by flies;
But although their dread intrusion I shall manfully resist,
I'm afraid they'll soon have got another rink upon their list.

When invited to a party I'm invariably late,
For I waste the time in efforts to conceal my peeping pate—
Though I coax my hair across it—though I brush away for weeks,
Yet I can't prevent it parting and dividing into streaks!

I have tried a hair restorer, and I've rubbed my head with rum,
But the thatch keeps getting thinner and the new hair doesn't come—
So I gaze into the mirror with a gloomy, vacant stare,
For the circle's getting wider of that open space up there!

People tell me that my spirits I must not allow to fall,
And that coming generations won't have any hair at all.
Well, they'll never know an anguish that can adequately match
With the pangs of watching day by day the thinning of your thatch!

The grievance committees of the trainmen and conductors on the Union Pacific system, which have been in session at Omaha for two weeks, are nearly to the end of their labors, and it is intimated that they will ask the railroad company to change a number of rules governing trainmen.

All That Is Needed.

In our physical needs we want the best of anything required, and we want all that is required to be done, to be done promptly and surely, and those in pain, especially, will find all that is needed in what is herein recommended. Mr. T. J. Murphy, 61 Debevoice pl., Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "Having been afflicted with sciatic rheumatism for some time past and finding no relief, I tried St. Jacobs Oil, which I found very efficacious."—Miss Clara Alcott, Mahwah, N. J., writes: "I bruised my limb and it became greatly swollen and stiff. I used two bottles of a patent linament which did not relieve me. A physician was called who ordered the limb to be poulticed, and he gave me medicine internally, without benefit. I then got a bottle of St. Jacobs Oil, which cured me. It acted like magic." Mr. Lorenzo Buck, Bancroft, Shiawassee Co., Mich., says: "I had chronic rheumatism for years, contracted during the war. After sitting or lying down, at times, I could not get up, from stiffness and pains. At work my strength would give out, then I would pass through a sickness of several weeks. I had to walk with a cane and was at one time so ill I could not lie down without terrible pains in back and limbs. I tried St. Jacobs Oil; next morning got up out of bed without assistance. To-day I'm a new man and walk without a cane."—Mr. A. H. Cunningham, Perryopolis, Fayette County, Pa., writes: "My wife was sorely afflicted with lame back for several years. She used innumerable liniments, but experienced little relief until St. Jacobs Oil was used. I can confidently say we owe her cure to its wonderful effects and would not keep house without it."

The smallest is the best in pills, other things being equal. But, with Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, nothing else is equal. They're the best, not only because they're the smallest, and the easiest to take—but because they do more good. They cleanse and regulate the liver, stomach and bowels in a way the huge, old-fashioned pill doesn't dream of. Think of trying to regulate the system with the ordinary pill. It's only good for upsetting it.

These are mild and gentle—but thorough and effective, no pain—no griping. One little pellet for a laxative—three for a cathartic. The best Liver Pill known. Sick Headache, Bilious Headache, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks and all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels are prevented, relieved and cured.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

Her figure was tall, slender, and elegantly turned. Her pale oval face was shaded with dark brown hair, and lighted up by large brown eyes. Her youth of toil and privation had given to her beautiful features and graceful manners an expression of gravity beyond her years.

On this particular afternoon Helen was in the drawing-room alone, when a servant entered, and in a low tone informed her that Mr. Morriss had come with a parcel from Black's.

"Show Mr. Morriss in here, and take the parcel to Robinson," said Helen.

The servant went out, and in the next moment Mr. Morriss was announced.

Helen arose and crossed the whole width of the room to receive him, saying with a smile—

"Well! I have been living here three years, and this is the first time you have been to see me. Was that kind of an old friend?"

"Under the circumstances, I think it was, Miss Lyle," replied the truth-teller.

"But why?" inquired Helen, as she led the way to a sofa, and invited him to be seated.

"The disparity of our conditions, Miss Lyle would seem to forbid the continuance of our acquaintance."

"Again why? I do not see the reason."

"I should be considered an intruder and an alien, Miss Lyle, in the sphere upon which you have entered."

"By whom? not by me," said Helen.

"By the people with whom you are surrounded, Miss Lyle, who might not like to meet in your drawing-room the shopman who waits upon them behind the counter."

"Then they need not do it. They can stay away. I myself am of the city; the money that I have inherited was made in trade; my affections and sympathies are with the people from whom I sprang, and among whom I was brought up. I do not seek acquaintances among the gentry; but if they seek me I shall treat them with courtesy, and I shall also expect them to treat with like courtesy the friends of my childhood whom they may meet at my house."

"Miss Lyle, that is nobly said, and like yourself; but I fear it is an impracticable theory. I fear the exigencies of your new position will compel you to drop your old friends."

"Never!" she said. "But why do you call me Miss Lyle? In those old, happy days at my grandfather's little school, it used to be Helen and Joseph. In the after days of trouble, it was still Joseph and Helen! Why should it now be Miss Lyle? Do you wish me to call you Mr. Morriss?"

"No, no! pray do not! Call me Joseph, I entreat you!" exclaimed the young man, as the color went and came.

"Then let me be Helen, as of old!—your friend Helen. Yes, Joseph, we must be friends! I have neither parents, brother, nor sister in the world, and I—shall never marry. So you and your wife, Joseph, must be like brother and sister to me. I hear that you are soon to be married, and I am glad that you came here this evening, as I have prepared a present for your young bride—"

The Marchioness of M—— and Lord George D—— were announced, and the two visitors entered the room.

Joseph took his hat to withdraw.

"No, don't go yet, I entreat you! This is the first time you have been here. I have seen so little of you, and—I have so much to say to you; pray wait till they are gone," whispered Helen, hastily.

Joseph bowed, and with a throbbing heart, retreated to the other end of the room, and tried to employ himself by looking at some fine stereoscopic views.

The marchioness met Helen with much empressement, taking her by both hands, and kissing her with every appearance of affectionate interest.

And to Joseph's astonishment—for he could not entirely confine his attention to the stereoscope, or quite avoid observing this interview—Helen seemed pleased and flattered by the condescension.

Lord George was equally attentive to the young lady of the house. They talked of the London season then at its height; of the Queen's last drawing-room, of balls, concerts, operas recent and approaching, and wondered why Mrs. Cassock and Miss Lyle did not come up to town. The marchioness then left cards for her morning concert at M—House, and soon after, with the same demonstration of affection, took her leave.

"And now," said Helen, advancing and joining Joe, "what do you think of that?"

"I think," replied the young man, that the Marchioness of M—must have some very important object in view when she condescends to come here and be so very gracious to you, Helen."

"That opinion is not very flattering to me at any rate," said the lady. "But how do you know that it was not my personal worth that attracted her?"

"Because, Helen, your personal worth, if it had been ten times as great, would not have attracted her ladyship had you remained a daily governess; and you know that quite as well as I do. And even now, greatly as your fortunes are changed for the better, there must be some very important object that brings Lady M—— to your house. Marchionesses do not often 'take up' city heiresses, no matter how wealthy the latter may be."

"You are—painfully candid! But what object do you suppose her ladyship has in view?"

"Your half million of pounds sterling, to pay the debts of her profligate second son, Lord George D—— whom upon account of his very bad character, even her influence has failed to get either into the army, navy or church. Her ladyship thinks that a city heiress would be glad to endow a broken-down younger son with her large fortune for the sake of being her daughter-in-law, and of being called Lady George D——, although the title is one of mere courtesy——"

"But I should be only one remove from the coronet, which would be mine in case the elder brother should go off! How do you think I should adorn it?"

"Not at all, Helen."

"Why?"

"Because you are not as they say, 'to the manner born'—you have not—what shall I say—the—the air, the expression, the—the indefinable something—so to speak—subtle aroma of high birth around you; that of the daily governess prevades you!"

"Well, really, Mr. Moriss, I do not know whether that last speech of yours is more remarkable for its politeness or its perspicuity!" said the astonished girl.

"I know it was not polite! Ah, Helen, the truth seldom is! And I am sure it was not clear, for I tried to define what was really indefinable; but you know what I mean."

"Yes; and if this is true, I wonder you should think that the marchioness could tolerate me as a daughter-in-law."

"Nor would she for her eldest son; but for her profligate, penniless, and deeply embarrassed younger one, she thinks your splendid fortune would make a comfortable provision."

"Still, she would be obliged to have me in her set."

"Not she! You would be only the wife of her younger son. When the family should be in town during the season, you would be stowed away at some remote country house, while Lord George could live at his club. When the family should be in the country, indeed you might be invited to dinner with the parson and the doctor!"

"That is—almost insulting! Why do you say these things to me, Joseph Morriss?" exclaimed the girl, flushing deeply.

"In the first place because I feel them true! In the second place, to save you, if possible, from a false and fatal step!"

"Do you think I am in danger of taking it?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because your manner to the marchioness and her disreputable son was——"

"Well, what? what was my manner?"

"Not what I expected from Helen Lyle!"

"But you have told me what it was not!—tell me what it was!"

"Toadying!"

"Well! Upon—my—word—and—honor!" exclamed Helen, with her large brown eyes dilating and sparkling with indignation, as she started up and paced up and down the room.

He followed her with his eyes. Her bosom was heaving, her face flushed, her eyes still scintillating light. His very heart sank like lead in his bosom. His face grew deadly pale and his hands icy cold—he felt as if he could have died on the spot; he would rather have offended the whole world than Helen Lyle.

Suddenly she came up and stood panting with passion before him, saying—

"Toadying! You said toadying!"

"Yes, I said toadying! and I cannot take back the word, because it expresses just what I mean, Helen, and I can think of no civiller one to use in its place. You asked me for the truth, Helen, and I gave it you! I can do no otherwise; God help me!" cried the young man, in a voice of anguish, using, quite unconsciously, the very words that Martin Luther used in the hour of his greatest extremity.

Helen rushed away from him, and walked heatedly up and down the floor.

"I feel that I have mortally offended you, Miss Lyle, and that I must depart," said the young man, taking his hat, and bowing lowly as he passed her.

CHAPTER VI.

NIL DESPERANDUM.

"No! Stay!" exclaimed Helen Lyle, in a tone so empathatic, and with a gesture so commanding, as suddenly to arrest the steps of Joseph Morriss, who stood like a statue where she stopped him.

She was still very much agitated; her bosom was heaving and setting; her cheeks flushing and paling; her eyes flashing and smoldering with the passion she could not entirely subdue.

"It is very bitter—very hard to swallow—but it is the—truth!" she cried, with an effort that seemed to choke her, as she sank down into a corner of the sofa and bowed her head upon her hand for a few moments. Then looking up, and seeing him still standing, she beckoned him to take the chair at her right hand, saying—

"Sit down, Joseph Morriss. I have no right to be offended with your straightforward honesty; nor must you think of leaving my house for such a cause. For the just rebuke you have given me, Joseph, I esteem and honor you the more."

"Helen! oh. if you did but know the exquisite pain it caused me to tell you that truth, you would almost forgive me!" said the young man, in a broken voice, as he stood humbly before her.

"I know! I know! and I do not forgive but thank you! I witnessed the great effort that it cost you to speak that humiliating truth, and I feel that it was all the more noble in you to do so. Great Heaven! what a thing the truth is! It shook you like a storm to utter it! it convulsed my whole nature to receive it! The passage of electricity from one tempest-cloud to another was nothing to it! But sit down; sit down; and promise me now that henceforth you will always do as you have done to-day;—always tell me the truth of myself, however bitter, humiliating, or wounding to my self-love it may be."

"Yes, Helen, I promise you."

"Notwithstanding that I may fly into a passion with my Mentor as I have done this afternoon."

"Notwithstanding even that."

"Ah, Joseph, you were right in another thing you said to me! I have not the everlasting self-possession that marks the highest breeding. I have proved that by entirely losing my temper this afternoon. No, I have the passion of my class, and my manners have not

"The repose
That stamps the caste of Vere de Vere,'" said Helen, smiling.

"And yet, dear Helen, I doubt whether the most statuesque of all ossified peeresses could have borne what you have this morning without some disturbance of their stolidity. And you, Helen, could not have been blamed if you had ordered me from your presence that instant; the act would have been natural and proper."

"I could not have done that, for your words, though they wounded me to the quick, were those of truth—truth painfully but nobly spoken!" said Helen, with a vivid blush. "Yet do not think of me worse than I deserve! If I was betrayed to-day into 'toadying' this marchioness, believe me, oh, believe me, such is not my habit!"

"That such is not consistent with your character I know, Helen; and therefore, that such is not your habit I believe."

"You are but just to me in saying this. I do not, indeed, court the upper classes with whom I am sometimes brought to associate. But this Lady M——, with her overpowering display of affection, seems to bewilder me and compel from me an excess of courtesy in return that must indeed seem to an honest observer very like 'toadying.' But it is the influence of this lady's presence over me, Joseph. Nothing more serious, I assure you."

"I understand it all now, Helen; and yet I do wonder that you should have been so carried away. But then I knew that Lady M—— is said to be the most attractive and fascinating woman to women, as well as to men, in all London."

"Yet do not think, Joseph, that, with all her enchantments. she could bewitch me into marrying Lord George."

"I should hope not, indeed."

"And as for the lady, I shall break her spell by breaking off the acquaintance."

"You will do well Helen."

"And now let us return to the subject that was interrupted by the visit of the marchioness," said Miss Lyle, drawing towards her a small sofa-table, upon which stood a casket of jewels, which she opened and displayed, saying—

"Here, Joseph, here are some fine pearls which I have selected for your bride; they will well become her child-like beauty. You will offer them to her in my name, and ask her to accept, with them, the best wishes of her bridegroom's oldest friend."

Helen's voice faltered a little at the close of this speech as she gently pushed the casket towards Joseph Morriss. He was dumb with astonishment for a moment, ere he could recover his self-possession, and answer—

"Thank you, dearest Helen, for this generous thought; but, thank Heaven, I have no bride!"

"No bride! Why, whatever do you mean? I thought—I was—was—positively assured that you were upon the eve of marriage with Elizabeth Bell," exclaimed Helen, in a trembling voice, and with a rapidly changing color.

"Such an engagement did exist, but it has been broken off by mutual consent," said the young man, gravely.

Helen was too deeply disturbed to reply for some moments. At length, forcing herself to speak, she said, in a low voice—

"This is some foolish lovers' quarrel, that must be made up."

"Never, Helen! It can never be made up!" Joseph exclaimed earnestly.

"Oh, but you say that because you are still very angry with her; but you are also very unhappy—you must be so; and she no doubt is at this moment breaking her heart——"

"She is at this moment probably chuckling at the idea of having got rid of a most uncompromising engagement."

"You only think so; let me, an old friend, mediate between you?"

TO BE CONTINUED.

THOUGHT SHE WAS COLORED.

How a Nurse in a Russian Family Received the Young Master's American Wife.

A very interesting talker is Count Eugene de Mitciewicz, who resides with his family in a fashionable uptown boarding house. The Count is very popular among the guests, he is a good story teller and is heard at his best when relating tales of Russian domestic life.

"Shortly after my marrirge," said he to a circle of listeners the other evening, "I went with my wife to visit my home in Russia. Now, you must know that in certain parts of Russia the lower classes know as little about this country as they do about the moon. Particularly was this so at the time of which I speak.

"Our family, had at that time a nurse in their employ who came from somewhere east of Moscow. She had been told that far away America was peopled with colored folks, and naturally when she heard that the "young master' was returning home with an American wife, she concluded that I had married a colored woman.

"This nurse, among her other accomplishments spoke French fluently. She was an imaginative creature and something of a poetess. She felt that it would be an incumbent on her to do something toward welcoming my wife to our home. Accordingly she wrote a poem in her honor.

"This poem tastefully decorated with black ribbons, was handed to me upon my arrival. And what do you think was the title of the poem? Simply this:—

"'A la belle Africaine.'

"That was a staggerer, you may be sure. Mutual explanations, however, followed, and the nurse, during our stay, was ever at my wife's side ready to pay homage."

A Cheap Dinner.

Venice is a cheap city, especially if you dine with the people in the fish kitchens of the Street of the Smiths. There you get a slice of smoking polenta as broad as a gondolier's palm and somewhat thicker for a penny. Another penny will, if fish be abundant, as it generally is, buy a plateful of palatable fry. Add to this a third penny for half a litre of wine and the bill is told. There is no doubting the nutrition in such a meal. The faces of the clients of the shops in the Street of the Smiths are plump and hearty, and the clients themselves are not famishingly impatient to be served when there is a crush, as there often is of an evening, when such work as Venice does is mostly at an end.—All the Year Round.

With a Moral.

A Weak Man going down hill met a Strong Man going up and said:

"I take this direction because it requires less exertion, not from choice. I pray you sir, assist me to regain the summit."

"Gladly," said the Strong Man, his face illuminated with the glory of his thought. "I have always considered my strength a sacred gift in trust for my fellow man. I will take you along with me. Just get behind me and push."—San Francisco Examiner.

A Temperance Story.

An exceedingly practical temperance lecture was preached to the freight handlers at one of the stations of the Pennsylvania railroad a short time ago, says the New York Tribune. The result is that each man now wears a blue ribbon and all mysterious-looking casks and barrels which are put off at that station and for which there are no known owners are left severely alone. A few months ago there came to this place by express a big barrel unaccompanied by any thing and having no mark by which the owner or its destination could be learned. There was an odor of whiskey about it, and it looked suspiciously like a whisky barrel. A tracer was sent over the road, but nothing could be learned as to where it came from; to whom it was going or by whom it was owned. It stood on the platform for a few days until it became a nuisance. The freight-handlers eyed it rather longingly, but could not get at it while it was in that conspicuous place. By the order of the station agent the barrel was taken to the loft of the store-room to await for a possible owner who might turn up some time in the future. It had been there for two or three months when one of the express companies' men went to the station agent and told him he was looking for a barrel of alcohol with two skeletons inside of it.

The station agent remembered the mysterious barrel and took the searcher to the loft. He immediately identified the barrel as the one which he was looking for. A kick from his foot produced a hollow sound, followed by the rattling of some dry object inside. A closer examination showed that numerous gimlet holes had been made in the head, and that the holes had been plugged up with matches.

The station agent sent for the freight-handlers to have them come to the loft and help take the barrel down.

"It's empty," faltered one of the men.

"Yes, I know; but I want to see if there is any thing inside of it," said the express agent, at the same time breaking in the head of the barrel with an axe. Out tumbled the two skeletons, to the horror and dismay of the freight-handlers. They were dumfounded and fled from the loft instantly. Not one of the men turned up for work for three days. All sent around word in the morning that they were sick. When they did come back each wore a blue ribbon, and they haven't since been known to take a drink of whiskey. Unclaimed freight is absolutely safe at the station now.

Josh Billings' Philosophy.

It iz a very wize man who iz able tew hide his ignorance.

Wisdum iz another name for genus, and both are the gift of God.

Munny an't akumulated so mulch tew satisfy wants as tew kreate them.

A man kan't learn to be wize enny more than he kan learn to be hansom

A man iz vain just in proportion tew hiz humility.

The Luxurys ov life, which are so often reprimanded, are after all the principal promoters ov industry.

The very thing that most men think they have got the most ov they have the least ov, and that is judgment.

When vice leaves an old man it iz no ways certain that virtew takes the place ov it, for sin sumtimes quits us bekause it haz nothing to feed on.

It seems very natral for all ov us to think that the world would git along very poorly if wan't for us, and if there wan't but one man left on the face ov the earth he would think just so too.

A vain man, flushed with success, spreads himself like a peakock on a fair day; but when hiz hour of trial cums, like a peakock on a wet day, he folds his spread "and steals silently away."

He Knows Better Now.

It is well for one to be careful in talking with strangers. "I had a curious experience on a train coming from New York a few days ago," said a gentleman to the Buffalo Expressionist." "I got into conversation with a young man, and, when he learned that I was from Buffalo he asked me if I knew a well-known insurance agent of this city. I answered him in the affirmative, and he asked me whether I knew him intimately. I told the stranger that the Buffalonian alluded to had beaten me at poker, and that probably he was the best poker-player in the city. Then I asked the inquisitive young man if he knew the insurance man, and he staggered me when he answered, 'Well, I ought to, for he is my father.' I nearly fainted, but I smoothed the matter over as best I could. Now when I meet that young man on the street he always laughs at me in the most amusing manner. It taught me a lesson, and now I never talk to people unless I know who they are."

VIRTUE OF PEELED ALMONDS.

An English Physician Upsets the Common Opinion of the Dainties.

An English physician is till this moment the sole authority for the statement concerning the nutritive value of peeled almonds. "I seldom go my rounds," he says, "without taking a little packet of almonds with me, and I find I am carried on for hours without so much as remembering that I have missed my tea or luncheon." He does not advocate their wholesome qualities except indirectly, but he will doubtless find many ready disciples to his theory.

Peeled and browned and salted almonds are a much-prized dainty, hitherto indulged in with caution under the impression that they were most pernicious in their effects upon the digestive organs. A few seasons ago, in Washington, the serious illness of several society women was alleged to have been caused by persistent almond munching, and the discussion evoked at that time created a prejudice against the crisp and toothsome edible. If we have been mistaken all these years, the gayety of the future, at least, is added to.—New York Times.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

DIED INSTANTLY.

Charles McIlvaine, the Murderer, Suffers Death by Electrocution.

He Takes His Seat in the Execution Chair, Shrieking Prayers for Mercy.

Sing Sing, N. Y., Feb. 9.—Charles McIlvaine, who murdered Groceryman Luca in Brooklyn two years ago, was electrocuted here to-day.

The amendment to the electrocution law having been signed by the governor, representatives of various papers and the press associations were present, and, as the report of the execution shows, the sensational reports of previous executions by electricity were unfounded.

Two contacts were made, but the doctors present are of the opinion that the second contact was unnecessary, McIlvaine's death being instantaneous when the current was first applied. There were slight blisters where the electrodes came in contact with the flesh, but the flesh was not cooked.

Stools were ranged about the room, in the middle of which stood an execution chair, which all who had seen Kemmler's death and the subsequent electrocutions at Sing Sing, recognized as new. It involved in its construction a new feature—that of provision for application of current through both hands as had been some time ago suggested by Thomas Edison.

The time was 11:05 when Warden Brown, addressing his visitors, warned them collectively, that no gratuitous advice or suggestions would be tolerated from any save those in charge officially. "Bring McIlvain in," said Warden Brown, turning to Keeper Connaughton and a deputy who stood near the door opening into the corridor that leads to the cells for the condemned. The time was 11:08.

The door was pushed open and the officers with the prisoner entered the room. The condemned man was pallid and his hands trembled and shook. "Oh Jesus help me," he murmured with emotion, and, then, as the control of his nerves slackened, he almost shouted his PRAYERS FOR MERCY.

Meantime he had been lowered into the chair. The head was pressed back against the leaden neck rest, an electrode was clapped upon the forehead and the clamp on the rubber tube was loosened so that the water flowed down into the electrode sponge. And while this was being done an officer on each side strapped the wrists and elbows, while others yet were strapping the legs at the ankles and an electrode was bound upon the calf of the right leg, from which the trousers leg, already ripped open, had been stripped away. "Jesus, spare me; merciful God, help me," muttered the prisoner, as the broad leather mask was bound across his face, concealing all his features save the nose and mouth. "I am heartily sorry, oh God, that I have offended thee," came once more in the muffled voice of the condemned man, and then, almost in a shout, "Let 'er go!" the condemned had given the word for his own taking off.

As he spoke the bidding for his own death stroke, Prof. Laudy lowered a small lever at the switch board on which were fastened the glowing testing lamps which showed the vicious current was flowing at 1,600 volts. There was a quick, convulsive jump of the subject. There was a slight sound of straining straps as the muscles tightened and tugged in the Titanic impulse which followed the application of the terrific current.

There was no movement in any part of the entire frame. "Close," commanded Dr. Macdonald, and the small lever at the switch board was pushed back to its place. The current was cut off at 11:12:40 a. m. The power of 1,600 volts of electro motive force had been busy forty-nine seconds.

Dr. Ward reached down into the cell on the right side of the chair and was feeling for pulse beats, when from the livid lips of the subject there showed an exudation of mucous sputum, and almost at the same instant there came from the throat a broken exhalation of air from the lungs which had thus expelled the last inhalation of air taken in at the last moment as the condemned nerved himself for the death stroke. Then came a shorter gasp, which was cut short in a gurgle by the reapplication of the current, which at the moment was flowing at 1,500 volts and 10 amperes.

WITHOUT BURNING THE FLESH.

Quickly there came to the ears of those nearest the chair the sound of a gentle hiss. Steam simultaneously started up from the electrode on the calf of the bard leg. "That is only steam from the saturated electrode," said Dr. Macdonald, and his opinion was supported by the fact that at the moment there was no smell of burning flesh, though a few moments later and after all was over there hung in the air a suggestion of smoke from burning flesh, probably the result of blistering under the heated water in the electrode.

"Stop," again ordered Dr. Macdonald, and the lever again cut off the current from the subject. Dr. Ward again advanced to test the wrists for probable pulse beats. There were none. The mask on the face was released so that the action, if any, of the blood in the jugular vein might be shown. Dr. Ward retired. Dr. Macdonald tested both at the wrist and neck, and then other physicians did likewise.

"HE IS DEAD,"

spoke Dr. Ward. "No doubt of it," declared Dr. Macdonald, and then he bade each professional man test for heart beats, adding that he desired each to be assured beyond peradventure that life was extinct. Each did so, without aid of instrument, until it came the turn of Dr. Robertson of New York. He produced a stethoscope and placed the rubber bell above the heart, listening intently for any evidences of life. He found none, but he declared that he thought any method of contact that involved a second application of the current as "brutal."

With the Whalebacks.

St. Louis, Feb. 9.—A scheme is on foot which may result in the shipment of grain from this city direct to Europe without transshipment. The success of the new steamers known as the "whalebacks" in making the voyage from Duluth to Liverpool has attracted the attention both of local exporters and Eastern capitalists, and it is believed that vessels of this class can be sent to Europe by the way of the Mississippi river and the Gulf of Mexico. A representative of an eastern syndicate has been in the city in consultation with the grain exporters, the government engineers in charge of the Mississippi river improvement and men familiar with the river with the view of putting the plan into operation.

LAKE NAVIGATION.

Timely Suggestions and Recommendations by a Committee of the House.

Washington, Feb. 9.—An interesting report was to-day submitted to the house to accompany a resolution reported by instruction of the committee on foreign and interstate commerce, requesting the president to negotiate with Canada to secure the speedy improvement of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals so as to make them conform in depth to the standard adopted by the United States for its improvements within the great lakes. The report says in part:

> The recent development of the untold resources of the great Northwest has made the productions of that region not only a vital part of our internal commerce, but the leading factor of our foreign trade. To facilitate this internal commerce congress has not hesitated to vote appropriations by millions. Its action in this behalf has met the country's approval. The committee believes that it is now equally important to take the proper steps to secure a deep water outlet for the foreign commerce originating in states tributary to the great lakes.
> The impracticability of deepening or improving the Erie canal so as to admit the passage of large craft seems to be admitted on all sides. It is hoped that the claim that it is feasible to construct a deep water canal from Oswego to the Hudson is well founded, but this would require many years for its execution and cost from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000. Pending this the committee thinks the great interests involved should be served by other means if available.

The report calls attention to the natural outlet by way of the St. Lawrence river which Canada has improved by the construction of the Welland and other canals and demonstrates the importance to this country of their common use by Canada and the United States. Says the report:

> If the canals were further deepened so as to correspond with the new Soo canal, Duluth, Milwaukee, Chicago, Cleveland and Buffalo would enjoy all the advantages of seaboard cities with reference to foreign trade. It appears to your committee that the present time is exceedingly opportune for urging such action in behalf of the commerce of the great lakes. It is reported that the representatives of the Canadian government will shortly arrive in this city to negotiate with our government for closer trade relations between the two countries.

The Pardon Severely Criticised.

Hutchinson, Minn., Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—Hutchinson is stirred from center to circumference by the pardon by Gov. Merriam of George Caterbery of thirteen years, who was recently committed to the reform school from this place. Only a few citizens petitioned for his pardon, and scores are signing an indignant protest against the governor's action, which was taken without consulting the justice who committed the boy, the district judge who approved the commitment, or the county attorney. The boy's offense was that of brutally assaulting a ten-year-old girl in her own home while her mother was away, and when arraigned the boy pleaded guilty to the charges. The protest against the pardon is very strongly worded.

A Logger Killed.

Black River Falls, Wis., Feb. 9.—John Francis, a well known logger along the Black river, was yesterday found about seven miles above this city pinned to the ground by a fallen tree. He was still breathing when found, but died about an hour after his rescue. Francis started out alone last Saturday to estimate a quantity of timber and it is supposed the tree, which was a dead one, blew over upon him. He must have suffered terribly, for the accident evidently took place Saturday about noon and he was not found until Sunday noon. Both legs were broken near the thigh. Francis lived in Clark county, and came to the Black River valley in 1851. He had accumulated much property.

Sanders Wins His Point.

Washington, Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—When Senator Sanders introduced his bill changing the boundaries of the Yellowstone Park cutting off that portion that was separated from the main section of the Yellowstone river, he had something of a fight to have it referred to the committee on public lands, of which he was a member. He won his point, and the bill went to the public lands committee to-day. He reported the bill back with recommendation that it go to the committee on territories, where it was suggested that it go when he introduced it.

A Moorhead Bank Closed.

Moorhead, Minn., Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—The Merchants Bank of Moorhead closed to-day. It is a private bank, H. A. Bruns and T. C. Kurtz forming the partnership. A petition has been signed by the creditors and sent to Judge Mills requesting the appointment of receivers, including the name of T. C. Kurtz. The deposits aggregate $175,000.

The Postoffice Located.

Tracy, Minn., Special, Feb. 9.—Front street gets the prize in the location of the postoffice, and will put up a building for its occupancy, renting the same to the department for the sum of $100 per year. To-day half a dozen leading business men subscribed $5,000 stock to start a new bank. Application was made to the secretary of state for permission to incorporate under the name of Kimball State bank. W. H. Wyant will be cashier.

No Mr. Smith.

A writer for the Boston Globe says that he lately met an old acquaintance who rejoices in the name of John Smith, a name so peculiar that it affords its possessor some amusing experiences.

"Some years ago, said he, when I was teaching school in Leadville, Colorado, I was the only Mr. Smith in that city. Don't laugh—hear me out. And when I had been there a month, there wasn't a Mr. Smith in Leadville."

The Boston man looked mystified, and began to intimate that this couldn't be true.

"Not so fast," answered Mr. Smith. "I will explain. There were Colonel Smith's, Judge Smith's and General Smith's in Leadville, to be sure, but not one Mr. Smith until I came. I was a school teacher, as I said, and within a month Mr. Smith became Professor Smith."

The United States court has decided that a debtor can make it exceedingly warm to the party that sends him a dun on a postal card. So stringent is the above that the decision of Superintendent of Mails Palmer of Pittsburg, quoted in a recent number of the Postal News, says that a final notice of unpaid taxes is a dun and therefore not mailable matter.

The Louisiana lottery is said to have thrown up the sponge because of the decision of the supreme court affirming the constitutionality of the law forbidding the transmission of lottery matter through the mails. That law has been enforced as rigidly as possible for a considerable length of time, and yet while it was in operation the lottery company felt safe in offering $1,250,000 per annum for 25 years for the privilege of continuing the business. Chauncy L. Baxter, the leading Democrat of Perham, was interviewed in St. Paul Monday, he said: "As far as congress is concerned there will be no fusion between the Democrats and the Alliance," said Mr, Baxter yesterday. "There will be three candidates in the field for the Democrats have decided to be in the race. I am of the opinion that Senator Lomen will be the Alliance candidate, for I believe that Senator Hompe has decided not to be a candidate, The latter has a firm hold in Otter Tail county, and it will be to his interest to remain in the senate, Baxter has been frequently mentioned as the Democratic candidate for congress in the seventh district. Mr. Baxter in his conversation with his friends did not deny that he would be a candidate, but intimated that his acceptance of the position would depend largely on the presidential nomination. In case Senator Dave Hill was nominated Mr. Baxter does not think he would be satisfied in taking the nomination if it was tendered him. Hill's chances of election, he thinks, are very poor, and there would be very little satisfaction in holding a seat under a republican administration.

American economist: One of the most important features of the tariff law of 1890 is the reciprocity section. Restricted reciprocity, would be a better term, as the provisions are limited, The law provides for the admission into the United States, duty free, of all sugars not above No. 15 Dutch standard in color, molasses, coffee, tea and hides: And whenever and so often as the president shall be satisfied that government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea and hides raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea and hides into the United States he may deem reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea and hides, the production of such country, for such a time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected and paid upon such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea and hides the product of or exported from such designated country.

Restricted reciprocity is not free trade. It is only on non-competing products that reciprocal relations are entered into. Consequently we are doubly benefited. Our people not only get free of duty such products as we cannot raise and upon which if a duty were imposed it would be a tax, but our farmers and manufacturers have certain of their products admitted free into foreign countries thereby enlarging our markets without sacrifising any of our own advantages. Restrictive reciprocity is the logical outcome of protective principles. In taking off the duty from a country's products we simply reciprocate for the remission of a duty, which would otherwise operate against us. Treaties have already been completed with five republics and nine colonies and many others are under consideration.

FEBRUARY FORECAST.

Ira Hicks in Word and Works.

The first February storm period will center about the third. By this date warmer weather, low barometer and well defined storm movements will be advancing from western regions. By the 6th heavy storms of rain and snow will have visited in their eastern progress most of the country. The chances for dangerous blizzards are many to the northward about the 3rd, to 5th. About the same dates the first battle between boreas and warm equatorial currents will take place around the southern flanks of storm movements, Sharp thunder storms with rain turning to hail and sleet will be the natural results. Cold days will follow until about the 9th and 10th, when the temperature will rise and secondary storms will again pass from west to east. At the winding up of every storm period, whether your section has been touched by actual storms or not, look for winds to shift to north and for the return of cold.

The 15th is the central day of the next regular period, This means that by that date it will be growing warmer in western parts of the country, storms will be organizing, winds shifting to east and south and advancing low areas of atmospheric pressure will prepare the paths for the storm king in his ride toward the atlantic, By the evening of the 18th he will "get there," leaving in his rear a fresh supply of polar air, with snow to the north, and gorged streams overflowing narrow valleys in central and southern regions. The reactionary movements of temperatures and stormes will center on the 21st and days touching it. Look for the different phases of all periods of disturbances from one to three days earlier in the west than in the Atlantic regions. Remember that the winds blow in the direction of the center of the disturbances giving warmer winds from the east and south when the center is in the west, and colder winds from the west and north when the center is in the east.

About the 25th all these indications will show to all observers that storm conditions are becoming well defined in the west. The 26th is the central day of the period. The new moon on the 27th at equinox of Mercury on March 2nd, and the growing strength of our vernal equinoctial, will add to the disturbances which are sure to result from about the 26th to 29th.

SELECTIONS

THE METRIC SYSTEM.

Reasons Why It Should Not Be Introduced Into the United States.

The system of measures having the meter for its basis has been much bepraised as theoretically and practically well nigh perfect. But Mr. E. Noel, of England, challenges it, and also the use of ten as a basis of notation. To begin with, the meter is an inconvenient unit. It is too long to pace and too long for architectural measurements. The foot is a much more convenient unit.

The value of the metric system is supposed, however, to lie in its decimality, or use of ten, and the consequent ease of calculation, and not in the particular length of the meter. But Mr. Noel gives reasons for considering the decimal the worst possible system of notation. The reason for its use, he thinks, is our having ten fingers, not its convenience. Ten is unhandy for divisions. The half of it is five—an odd number—and its fourth is not a whole number. In business and ordinary transactions we want to halve and to quarter things; also to divide into thirds. We rarely wish to divide anything first of all into tenths. The series half, quarter, eighth and sixteenth comes more naturally and usefully to the mind than tenth, hundredth and thousandth. A system based on twelve would be better.

Then we should have halves, quarters, thirds and sixths. In multiplying we get along too fast if we have ten to start with. Ten times ten is a big jump. In measures of area and capacity we find this inconvenient. We cannot apply the decimal system conveniently to many things in practice. We do not want ten or a hundred, but twenty-four hours in a day. A circle is better with its 360 degs., with 90 in each quadrant. The pound of sixteen ounces is vastly more convenient than the kilogram (2.2) pounds, which is 1,000 grams. Nobody wants so little as a thousandth or even the hundredth part of a kilogram of sugar. We find ourselves instinctively halving and quartering the kilogram when we use it. The terms hectogram and dekagram are not used in practice. The binary system, which prevails in India, admits of continual halving; eight, sixteen or sixty-four being taken as the basis.

The Romans used duodecimals, our words ounce and inch being derived from the Latin for one-twelfth of the as. "There are," says Mr. Noel, "three main systems of the subdivision—the decimal, duodecimal and the binary—and of these the decimal is the worst." A proof of the inconvenience of the French system is that the French do not themselves use it fully. They do not use the decaare, or the milliare, while the square meter they call the centiare—the 100th part of a square of ten times itself. The hectare is used, but not the kiloare or myriare. The liter, the unit of capacity, is too small, being the cube of the decimeter. The milliliter is, of course, too small for use, while the kiloliter is too large, being over four hogsheads. The hectoliter is merely a name for 100 liters, not a cubic measure.

The dekaliter, deciliter and centiliter are mere names, and are not in use. Practically the liter is the only real cubic measure in use. The unit of weight is the gram, which is ridiculously too small, being about one twenty-eighth of an ounce. Hence the use of a thousand of it, the "kilo," for a practical unit, which is too large. 'Myriagram is not used. Beyond that the Greek prefixes fail, and 100,000 grams is called a quintal. Summing up objections to the metric system we find that, being a system of pure decimals, its subdivisions are too small: that it affords only one real measure in each series and many of its measures are nominal: that its standards are of inconvenient size: that its measures of capacity are bad and unnatural; and, finally, that the scientific connection between its measures of capacity and weight is unsatisfactory.—Baltimore Sun.

Good Manners at Home.

The presence of good manners is nowhere more needed or more effective than in the household, and perhaps nowhere more rare. Whenever the familiarity exists there is a tendency to loosen the check upon selfish conduct which the presence of strangers involuntarily produces. Many persons who are kind and courteous in company are rude and careless with those whom they love best. Emerson says, "Good manners are made up of pretty sacrifices," and certainly nothing can more thoroughly secure the harmony and peace of the family circle than the habit of making small sacrifices one for another.

Children thus learn good manners in the best and most natural way, and habits thus acquired will never leave them. Courtesy and kindness will never lose their power or their charm, while all spurious imitations of them are to be despised.—Hall's Journal.

A Colossal Knife and Fork.

A cutler in New York displays in his window a colossal carving knife and fork that are said to be the largest in the world and probably the most costly. They were placed there on exhibition a day or two since. They are upreared in the window, resting on the handles, with the blade and prongs crossed. They fill the entire front of the window and look like the arch of a great gateway. The knife is 10½ feet long, the blade 16 inches wide. The fork is 7½ feet long. The handles were made by the proprietor of the store out of an extra large pair of elephant's tusks, and alone are worth over $800. The knife and fork together weigh 820 pounds, and are valued at about $1,500. The blade of the knife is etched with the arms of the state and other designs and the ivory handles are handsomely carved.—Philadelphia Ledger.

If it were sought to express in one phrase the expectations of those who are planning the Columbian exposition of 1893 in Chicago, it could best be done by calling it a Venetian spectacle. In all that governs its best effects, as it will burst upon the vision of the multitude, it will suggest Venice. Especially at night will it call to mind what the poetic comprehension conceives that Venice might appear if she were in gala attire, and her beauties, seen under a flood of electric light, were effectively concentrated along two miles of the Adriatic shore.

The beautiful waters of the system of lagoons pass every one of the main buildings, and all but surround some of them. On their surfaces all the palaces will be reflected, and at night the water will duplicate the full brilliancy of this, the second of the world's expositions which electricity has rendered viewable after dark. The water itself, by the way, will be shot with brilliant light by scores of electric lamps placed in its depths. A hundred gondolas brought from Venice will loaf luxuriously along these liquid avenues, to be distanced contemptuously by a myriad of swift launches.

Their motions on the water's surface will but weakly imitate the fast gliding artificial denizens of the deep which skilled electricians plan to send hither and thither by means of delicate machinery urged by power stored in the bodies of the toys. At night, when the eyes of these submarine monsters and beauties are lighted by electricity, they will add a strange feature to the general spectacle.—Julian Ralph in Harper's.

Miss Ethel Ingalls.

No photograph can do Ethel Ingalls, the daughter of ex-Senator Ingalls, justice, for it is to her exquisite coloring that much of her beauty is due. She is tall, well proportioned and erect, with fine figure and small, beautifully shaped hands and feet. But perhaps her chief beauty is her golden brown hair, which curls naturally and waves around her forehead in shining ringlets. It is worn quaintly parted and drawn low into a soft knot. Her eyes of a warm dark brown and full of kindliness and intelligence, forming delightful contrast to her hair and fair complexion. She dresses very simply, but always becomingly. Pink is her favorite color, and its becomingness is greatly enhanced when worn with moonstones—her favorite gem.

Miss Ingalls inherits from her mother an amiable disposition, which indeed is a family trait, with just a dash of the sarcasm for which her father is noted. Affectionate, very impulsive, romantic, extreme in her likes and dislikes, she is a bundle of contradictions which makes a harmonious and lovable whole. She is somewhat superstitious, and will begin nothing of importance on Friday. She chooses rather one or two very close friends than a number less dear. She is extremely fond of dogs and horses, an enthusiastic admirer of nature and delights in flowers. Though not herself a finished musician, she is very fond of music. Her warmest friends are usually among older men and women. She is loved much or not at all.—Jean Mallory in Ladies' Home Journal.

Advice for Home Dressmakers.

When the amateur dressmaker starts on her devious way, she goes forth with a good deal of courage, but neglects to put her armor on. To be exact, she knows that she is undertaking a difficult thing, but she hopes it will come out all right and trusts to her luck to pull her through; of foresight she has little or none. Now, home dressmaking is of all things the most tiresome if the first steps are wrong. Let us therefore consider how the amateur who wishes to make for herself a successful waist from a paper pattern should set about it.

First, don't use just any pattern you may happen to have. If you are to attain anything like a moderate degree of success, the pattern should be at the start as nearly correct as possible. Now it is very well known that when paper patterns are cut to size, they are drafted to the size of bust and waist measure alone, all the other measures bearing a certain average proportion.

Good drafters are thoroughly acquainted with the average proportion, and such people as have no difficulty in buying ready made jackets to fit them will find no difficulty with a bought pattern of proper bust measure. In order to obtain this proper bust measure, draw the tape between the shoulder blades and above the bust, across the chest. The measurement usually denominated "the bust measure" should more properly be termed "chest measure." The tape should be drawn quite tight, to give the proper size.—Leisure Hours.

The Power of Imagination.

"I see a report of the peculiar conduct of a child after being bitten by a cat," said Dr. J. W. Thudfield. "The child is said to move stealthily about the house, to mew and to do other things which resemble the acts of a common Tabby. For my part, I believe the statement is purely imaginative. It comes from the idea that one affected with hydrophobia imitates a dog. That is a common delusion, with as little foundation as other delusions.

"It is true that a person sometimes seems to bark, but what is called a bark is due to an intense pain of the throat and the difficulty of speaking. The same cause produces the dislike of all kinds of liquid—a dislike which the public in general imagine is confined to water. This is the true theory about hydrophobia upon which so much ignorance at present prevails."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

An After Christmas Rush.

It is said that there was a noticeable rush on neckwear immediately after Christmas, which was unaccountable until it was discovered that the buyers were of the thousands of men whose best girl had given them a scarfpin, and as a result they were out looking for the best scarf to go with it.—Clothier and Furnisher.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

"Not for the world!—not for ten thousand worlds! In this seemingly exaggerated language, Helen, I only speak the truth. Nothing in the universe would tempt me to bind myself to that fatal engagement from which I am now so honorably and so happily free!" exclaimed the young man, earnestly.

"You astonish me beyond measure. Will you explain how this occurred? I hope it was not you, Joseph who first broke the engagement," said Helen, in a deeply interested manner.

"No; it was not I who broke the troth. Lizzy's own act this morning freed me from the consequences of a tremendous mistake that might have ruined her happiness, and that must have ruined mine."

"But why did she do this? I hope you gave her no just cause?"

"None."

"Why, then, was your marriage broken off?"

"Because she did not love me at all!"

"And when did she first find this out?"

"When she found out that my uncle had disinherited me, and my employers had discharged me, and that I was, in fact, an almost penniless man, without visible means of supporting a wife."

"And has your uncle indeed disinherited you?" inquired Helen in consternation.

"He has indeed, Helen."

"But for Heaven's sake, upon what account?"

"Speaking the truth."

"Speaking the truth!"

"Yes, Helen, for confessing, when the question was forced upon me, that I should not be absolutely inconsolable if he were to die."

"But how strange! Did he really expect you to be so?"

"I do not know; at all events he did not like to be told otherwise."

"But what an unreasonable old soul! Why, even parents do not wish their children to break their hearts from excess of filial piety at their decease."

"No, but you see uncles are more egotistical and less disinterested than parents."

"And has he really disinherited you upon this account?"

"Yes."

"What a very weak old man; and how very unfortunate that you should have been compelled by truth to wound him in this weak point."

"It was, indeed."

"And you told me, I think, that your employers had——"

"Dismissed me; yes."

"Strange that such misfortunes should have happened to you upon the same day!"

"And for the same cause, Helen."

"For the same cause?"

"Yes; for speaking the truth!"

"For speaking the truth?"

"Yes."

"How singular!—and how unlucky that you should have been obliged to speak so many offensive truths in so short a time as to deprive you at once of your inheritance and your employment. But how was it in this second instance? What fatal facts were you compelled to divulge?"

"When plainly questioned by our customers, I was obliged in one instance, to confess that the prints marked 'fast colors' would fade; in another, that the silks marked 'French' and 'three shillings a yard,' were inferior English, worth only two shillings; and so on through a morning of usual cross-examination by customers, to whom this morning I resolved to answer truly."

"Mercy on us!—then I don't wonder that you were discharged. And for these reasons your betrothed discarded you?"

"For these reasons, really, Helen; but ostensibly for the same cause that lost me my inheritance and my situation."

"You do not mean for speaking the truth?"

"Yes."

"But what unpardonable truths could you have had to tell your betrothed?"

"First, that she was not an angel; secondly, that she was not even a perfect woman; thirdly, much more in the same strain."

"You were finding fault with her?"

"No, I was simply telling her the truth in reply to questions and observations she pressed upon me; nor would she have taken offence at my answers had she not been anxious for an excuse to break with me, because I had lost everything, and was therefore no longer an eligible match for her. She would have been ashamed to have broken with me upon account of my misfortunes, but she eagerly seized upon the opportunity that my truth-telling afforded her. But I had better tell you all about it, dear Helen, and then you will understand the subject better."

And Joseph related nearly word for word all that had passed between himself and Lizzy, and ended by saying—

"Thus, you see, I made the discovery of how really selfish, hard, and treacherous she is to whom I was about to commit my whole life's welfare. I found out in the same moment that her apparent affection for me had been nothing but self-interest, and that mine for her had been a moral illusion dispelled by the touchstone of truth. So, Helen, do not condole with me, but congratulate me upon this great deliverance. Like yourself, I may never marry, but at least, thank God, I am free."

Then fell a silence between them for a few moments, and then they raised their heads, and by a simultaneous impulse their eyes met.

"Joseph," whispered Helen in a low voice, "you promised always to tell me the truth—will you do so now?"

"Now and always, dear Helen."

"Then tell me the name of the woman whom you have so exalted in your imagination, whom you profess to admire so much, but whom, without seeming to know it, you really love so devotedly."

Fire and ice seemed successively to burn and freeze his blood, as, with a voice choked with emotion, he faltered—

"Ah, Helen! one placed so high above me in worth as well as in wealth that I have never dared to hope for her love, or to acknowledge even to myself how devotedly I could have loved her had I been permitted to do so!"

"Her name—tell me her name?" whispered the young lady.

"Helen Lyle!" breathed Joseph Morriss, sinking upon his knees, and bowing his head over her hand that he had taken.

Bending her face lowly over his auburn curls, she whispered—

"And will Helen's love console you a little for all you have lost to-day?"

"Ah, Helen, love—best love!" cried Joseph, in a voice suffocated with emotion.

"Because, if it will, it is yours," said the girl, bending still lower over his head, and murmuring close to his ear.

Then, with gentle force, she raised him from his kneeling posture.

In another moment he was seated by her side; his tongue was loosed, and he was pouring forth, with all the eloquence of passion, his long-hidden admiration and long-concealed love to ears that gladly listened to the tale; and then he learned how long, how exclusively, and how unchangeably Helen had loved him, even from their childhood; how she had resolved never to marry any one else; and, when she heard that he was to be married to Elizabeth Bell, she had still wished to befriend him, and had gone secretly to Black, Brown and Co., and had deposited five thousand pounds with them, to Joseph Morriss's credit, upon condition of their taking him into partnership on his marriage.

All this came out through the obligatory truth-telling on both sides; and finally, it broke upon them like a sunburst that it was truth-telling which had brought him all this happiness at last.

"God bless the truth! Long live the truth! It got me into some ugly scrapes at first, but has brought me gloriously through them all; and henceforth will I speak the truth, and nothing but the truth, so long as I live!" exclaimed Joseph, with enthusiasm, as, late that evening, he took a happy leave of Helen Lyle, and threw himself into an omnibus.

CHAPTER VII.

"Glorious!
O'er all the ills of life victorious!"

Joseph Morriss was just stepping out of the omnibus at the stand, with a face perfectly radiant with happiness, wild with joy, when a familiar voice, in a very unfamiliar tone, struck his ear, exclaiming—

"Ah! there he is now, poor, dear fellow! Thank Heaven, we have found him at last! But good, gracious, how wild he do look, to be sure—for all the world as if he was a-going to leap and dance. Anybody, only to see him now, would know as how he was ramping mad. Joey, my poor dear boy, do you know your old aunty?" inquired good Mrs. Morriss, looking anxiously into his face.

Astonished at this question blending with the delight that was effervescing in his heart and sparkling from his face, did make our hero look rather old. Seizing his aunt's hand, and shaking it heartily in the ecstacy of his soul, he answered, joyously—

"Know you? why, what should hinder me from knowing you? To be sure I know you, Aunt Molly? And oh, aunt I am so happy!"

"Are you, poor, dear innocent?" she said, in a coaxing tone, edging cautiously away from him. Then turning to the policeman who was attending her, she whispered—

"He gets wilder and wilder; you'd better secure him at once, before he does himself or some one else a mischief. And you'd better slip the cords on him, for fear he should break away; but oh, Mr. Policeman, don't be rougher than you can help with him, as if he was a convict, which there never was one in our family. Be gentle with him, poor unfortunate!"

Joseph Morriss, totally oblivious or incredulous about Harry Blewitt's threat of Bedlam, gazed from one to the other in wild surprise, which, joined to the excessive delight that still radiated from his face, and the authentic accounts of his strange behavior during the day, certainly warranted the strongest suspicions of his sanity. The policeman, deluded by Mrs. Morriss, and deceived by Mr. Joseph's own looks, approached him cautiously; and then, before Joseph had time to recover his astonishment, or think of resisting the outrage, this experienced man-catcher had slipped the cords upon the wrists of the supposed maniac, who, finding himself so unexpectedly restrained, began, too late, to struggle, stamp, and threaten, exclaiming—

"What's all this? What on earth do you mean? Take them off this instant! What have I done? Release me, I say! I'll make you repent of this. Let me go this moment, I say!"

"Oh, deary me, oh, deary me! It's mounting higher. Oh, Joey, my poor dear innocent, do be quiet, and go with the kind gentleman. It's to do you good," coaxed Mrs. Morriss, keeping at a safe distance all the time.

"Kind gentleman! an insolent policeman going beyond his authority. I'll pay him for it!" cried the young man, still struggling violently.

"Oh, my dear boy, it's all for your own good; it's to keep you from doing mischief."

"Doing mischief! I believe you are all mad."

"Ah that's the way with all these misfortunates; they think everybody mad but themselves," whimpered Mrs. Morriss.

"Same as drunkards, mum, as thinks everybody intoxified but themselves," said the policeman, who was red in the face with his efforts to force the victim into a cab.

"As sure as I live I will punish you, you insolent wretch! and you, too, aunt," exclaimed Joseph, vindictively.

"Ah, poor dear innocent, he don't know what he's a saying of. It's the worst of these poor misfortunates as they allers turn against their best friends," sobbed the old lady.

"Sure to do it, mum; cause why? their intellectuals get turned upside down, and incourse their affections are bottom upwards likewise," said the hard-working officer, as the perspiration poured from his face in his efforts to master the supposed lunatic.

"Oh, Mr. Policeman, call some one to help. Cabby, why don't you help?" cried Mrs. Molly, desperately.

"Couldn't leave the horse, mum. He's frightened now, and might run away," replied the stolid cabman, who enjoyed the scene much too keenly to interfere to shorten it.

"The idea of a cab-horse running away; I'd as soon expect the monument to bolt! Don't tell that to a Londoner. La! won't some of you help, gentlemen, to get this poor misfortunate young man into a cab?" said the old lady, appealing to the by-standers.

"I'll help, mum. Poor gentleman! I thought how he wer' addled this morning when he talked so queer, and he guv me a crown when I axed him for a penny," said a man, stepping forward, and proved to be the very tramp whom Joseph had relieved in the morning.

"And did you see him also this morning, my good man? Then come along with us and tell us all about it, how he acted, and what he said," urged Mrs. Morriss.

But the tramp was helping the policeman, and between them both, Joseph Morriss, struggling, kicking, butting, biting, and resisting in every possible manner his corded hands would permit, was forced into the cab. The policeman and the tramp jumped in after to take care of him. Mrs. Morriss, fearing to trust herself so near a madman, took another cab.

And then, amid the hurrahs of the crowd that had collected to witness the fun, they drove off towards Little Britain, and drew up before the house of Mr. John Morriss.

The tramp and the policeman had made such good use of their opportunities in the cab, they had succeeded in binding the accused maniac hand and foot; and in this helpless condition Joseph Morriss was lifted out and borne into the front parlor and deposited upon a large sofa. His veins were swollen, his face was crimson, his eyes glaring, and his mouth foaming with impotent fury; he looked, indeed, like a maniac ready to break forth into frenzy.

The room was half full of people who had come to attend his examination, and had been impatiently awaiting his appearance.

First there was his uncle, John Morriss, who came and looked over him with a very penitent air saying, with the tears in his eyes—

"Ah, poor fellow! poor fellow! I'd beg his pardon if I thought he would understand a word I said!"

"Then Dr. Cotton, the comfortable medical attendant of the family, who came and gazed sympathetically upon the inflamed, glaring, foaming face—and sighed; felt the bounding pulse and groaned; and, lastly, looked around on the assembled friends and shook his head.

"What do you think, doctor? Hadn't we better get him off at once to some asylum where he can be taken care of?" inquired the affectionate but cowardly and terrified Mrs. Morriss.

"I would rather question some of the friends who have observed his manners during the day, before I give a final opinion," said Dr. Cotton.

About half a dozen men and women started forward and began to speak at once.

"One at a time! One at a time my dear, dear, good friends! Mrs. Morriss, do you speak first, and pray tell us what you observed in the appearance of your nephew when he first came down in the morning?" inquired Dr. Cotton.

"La, doctor! when he entered the breakfast-room, which is just behind this room, you know, he looked very odd about the eyes, and said his head felt queer."

"Yes, and then?"

TO BE CONTINUED.

THE MIND TAKES A NAP.

Moments That Are Erroneously Believed To Be Spent In Thought.

In private conversation one day last week one of Chicago's oldest and most learned physicians gave utterance to the following:

"Why is it that when we see a person gazing fixedly for several moments at a certain point on the floor or in the street, we say he or she is thinking hard about something? Nine times in ten the person thus engaged—or disengaged—is thinking of nothing. At such times, if you only knew it, the mind is napping and there is no thought. Probably one of the oldest fads—and it seems to be nothing more—consists of persons when at such times they are asked what they are doing saying 'thinking hard!'

"In the larger majority of cases when a person is thinking hard or intently the eye roams from one object to another and the hands and feet are moving more or less.

"The busiest, hardest working brain in the country insists on taking momentary naps several times a day. Just before dropping off into one of these naps the mind commands the eye to fix itself upon some object and stay, thus usually insuring the holding of the head and probably every part of the body quiet. Then the mind catches its little nap. These little mind naps or flashes of rest may never be more than twenty seconds long, and yet they have been discovered to do the mind a wonderful amount of good. They never come to the deranged mind, and it has also been discovered that the supposedly sound mind which does not take them is on the verge of insanity."—Chicago Tribune.

Not Red Hot.

A little knot of townsmen were wont to prolong their drinking bouts, and when there was no law closing public houses at 11 P. M., in Scotland, these sederunts extended not seldom far on into the morning hours. To try and check the doings of the topers on one occasion, at the hour when the couple of candles had nearly expired, there was no gas in our town in those days, a spectre of human build, but robed in white, and carrying a lantern under the enveloping sheet so as to produce a diffused red light, stalked into the gloomy room, and stood in what was hoped would be a terror-stricken silence. As gravely as if he rose to meet some mourner, one of the tipsy crew stood up on his feet. Forming a bubble of saliva on his lip, he poised it on the tip of his middle fingers, and, projecting it toward the supposed emissary of terror in a way that most boys understand and occasionally practice when in vulgarest mood, the swaying drunkard shot the moisture hard at the glimmering sheet and figure, with the one remark, Scottice: Ye're a gude while oot or ye'd have fizzed."—The Spectator.

RUSSIAN DUST.

It Has No Equal in the World—Mud in Winter.

None but those who have seen it, breathed it and felt it would believe in the dust of a Russian village or a little town. It has no equal in the world save in the winter's mud of the same village. In the summer we look upon our ill-kept streets through a haze of golden mist—golden enough when the sun's rays streams through it, but which leaves a coating of gray powder upon furniture, floors, hair, face and hands. In the winter this dirt is converted into a mass of liquid mud, black, sticky, and tenacious, in which pigs wallow to their hearts content, and with which every passing vehicle so bespatters walls and houses that their original color becomes indiscernible! The back of our house opens upon a piece of waste ground overgrown with weeds, save where they have been beaten down by mounds of dirt, broken crockery and other refuse, but here a few kopecks and liberal use of tea speedily brought improvement. The lower classes in Russia, especially the servants, are delightfully good-natured. They are also for the most part very intelligent, though unhappily, their cleverness not infrequently degenerates into cunning; nevertheless, their idleness, their carelessness, their reckless indifference to truth, make them both difficult and trying to deal with. One is so delighted at first with their good temper and willingness to oblige; it is such a pleasure to look into their beaming faces and hear their ready assent to every proposition, but unluckily, nine times out of ten their readiness stops with their assent. You are so pleased with them, and they are so pleased with themselves, that they do no more. They are satisfied, though you are not. I am ashamed to acknowledge how often I have felt that a few blows would have soothed my irritated feelings, and I had often also felt additional mortification of perceiving that they not only expected these blows, but despised me for not inflicting them.—Murray's Magazine.

CONGRESS.

At Last Takes Action.

A bill has been introduced at Washington requiring all baking powders containing alum and ammonia to be so labeled. This is a step in the right direction, and has been long foreshadowed by the action of state legislatures, boards of health, food commissioners, etc., in the matter. The bill affords needed protection to the public, for the evidence as to the injurious effects of alum and ammonia is very heavy; but it will nevertheless be fought bitterly by the manufacturers whom it effects who are accustomed to sell their goods as "pure Cream of Tartar," "absolutely pure," etc.

The bill is something needed. If a maker uses a drug in his powder, the name of which he does not want to have printed on his label, it is prima facie evidence that there is something wrong. We hope the subject will be vigorously prosecuted all over the country, not only as regards baking powder, but also all other food adulterations.

The bill may incidentally benefit the makers of pure articles, but if it should, this is only an additional point in its favor.

How Victoria Is Informed.

The unofficial post of "queen's reporter" has become vacant by the removal of Lord Lewisham to the House of Lords. Since George III. required Lord North to send him a nightly account of the House of Commons debates, the sovereign has always been supplied with a special report, which has been invariably written by the leader of the House, except during Mr. Disraeli's last two years, when the late Lord Barrington did the work; and since 1887 it was confided to Lord Lewisham, in cosequence of Mr. Smith's reluctance to undertake it.

The parliamentary reports of Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Palmerston, Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone were all very bright and graphic, those of Mr. Disraeli being particularly lively and much resembling the political passages in his earlier novels. These are all preserved in the present library at Buckingham Palace, and it may be hoped that some day they will be published, for they form a complete House of Commons history during the present reign of the most brilliant and interesting description.—London Truth.

A Real New England Dinner.

We venture to say that a New England dinner should include roast turkey—a purely American dish—roast chicken, roast beef, venison, for the Pilgrims did shoot deer, chicken pie, baked beans and brown bread, Indian pudding, apple sauce, doughnuts, pears and grapes, walnuts and butternuts. And we venture to say, further, that if a vote were taken, nine-tenths of those present would prefer these comfortable, homely, and we also assert, healthy dishes, to the long succession of split up courses invented by French gourmands and spiced beyond any healthy palate's discovery of their constituent elements. Let Paris rule the kitchen for the Union Club and board of trade dinners; but when we sit down to a New England feast let us have at least something to remind us of our New England childhood.—New York Independent.

There's danger in a cough—more than ever when your blood is "bad." It makes things easy for Consumption. But there's a cure for it in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. A positive cure—not only for Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma and all lingering Coughs, but for Consumption itself in all its earlier stages. It's reasonable. All these diseases depend on tainted blood. Consumption is simply Lung-scrofula. And for every form of scrofula and blood-taint, the "Discovery" is a certain remedy. It's so certain, that its makers guarantee it to benefit or cure, in every case, or the money is refunded. With a medicine that is certain, this can be done.

There's a cure for Catarrh, too, no matter what you've been led to believe. If there isn't, in your case, you'll get $500 cash. It's a bona-fide offer that's made by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. There's risk in it, to be sure, but they are willing to take the risk—you ought to be glad to take the medicine.

CONSUMPTION.

I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind and of long standing have been cured. Indeed so strong is my faith in its efficacy, that I will send TWO BOTTLES FREE, with a VALUABLE TREATISE on this disease to any sufferer who will send me their Express and P. O. address. T. A. In nothing has the wonderful improvement of modern machinery over the old appliances been more marked than in tools for drilling deep into the earth for pure water, and in no line of business is there as good a chance for an energetic man with a small capital to become independent. Any man can make money rapidly who is intelligent, energetic and has a small capital. The business is easily learned and the demand is absolutely unlimited. The profits are large when improved machinery is used. Great improvements have been made in this line within the past year or two, and Rogers & Ordway, St. Paul, Minn., carry a complete line of machinery suitable for any depth or formation. Any man who wants to learn more regarding this matter will do well to send to Rogers & Ordway for an illustrated catalogue, which will give him a more detailed description of the different styles of machines carried, as well as a list of Wind Mills, Pumps, Fittings, etc., which go with this business.

La Grippe.

How to Avoid Its Attacks and How to Recover from Its Effects.

As la grippe is undoubtedly caused by some micro-organism carried in and by the air, the best general advice which can be given is to avoid exposure in inclement weather, and keep your strength up, your blood in good condition, and your digestive organs in regular action. These last three conditions can best be attained by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which so happily meets the requirements that with its protection you Need Not Fear La Grippe.

It has been wittily said that la grippe "keeps you sick fifteen days after you are well," so slowly is strength recovered. Hood's Sarsaparilla has been found of inestimable value in restoring desired vigor after la grippe and also after scarlet fever, diphtheria, pneumonia, and other prostrating diseases. The system finds in the building-up qualities so much needed, through the life-giving properties it imparts to the blood.

THE BEAUTY OF WOMEN.

An Interesting Rhapsody From the Pen of Ex-Mayor Carter Harrison.

In his Christmas sermon Bishop Potter mourns because woman has beauty, and says it "leads her to sin, and deflects the flowing of life's stream." He even doubts if it is worth while to have beauty at all."

Bishop, I close my eyes and go back in years to the time when, a tiny baby I lay in a woman's lap. I look up into dark brown eyes, and upon a face full of female beauty. I can not speak. My infant tongue can form no word, but I coo out in gentle murmurs: "My beautiful mother." A few years roll by. I lie on a rug at a woman's feet on a warm summer's day. A dove gently coos on a tree close by; a cricket chirps on the summer's hearth, and the old clock in the corner goes tick-tuck—tick-tuck—tick-tuck. The woman gently hums a sweet song as she fans my cheek. I close my eyes and dream. I dream of my beautiful mother. Long years go by. I am past a half-century old. I am pressed to a woman's heart. She is past three score years and eighteen. An ocean will soon divide mother and child. Her eyes are yet soft and brown; a flush of love is upon her face as she blesses her son. I never saw her again. But in my heart lives her image—the image of a beautiful woman. The scene shifts. I am standing at God's altar. I look to my side and see a beautiful girl. As I placed upon her finger a circlet of gold our eyes meet, a flush of love mantles her cheek, for she knows I am whispering: "My beautiful wife." Mother and wife sit now above in white-robed purity, and, thank God! both were and both are beautiful.

Bishop, woman's beauty does not lead her to sin, nor does it deflect the pious flowing of life's stream. Do not try to teach men that beauty leads to sin. A French woman once, when told that something she wanted to do was naughty, replied, "Yes, but it is so nice to be naughty." If you teach men that it is doubtful "whether it is worth while to have beauty or not," you will have empty benches to preach to, and your congregation will be standing on street corners by daylight and at night, with lanterns in hand, groping, like Diogenes, after beautiful sin. No, no! Grecian genius waved a magic wand and the Apollo sprang from cold marble. Greek genius looked upon a human model and the chisel turned hard stone into undulating Venus. Raphael dipped his pencil into tints stolen from the rainbow, attuned his heart to a song chanted by angels, and the Madonna della Segiola exorcises sin from the beholder. Murillo caught a flame from genius, and his ascending Mary convinces the looker-on that the immaculate conception was a possibility. Again, Bishop, take a layman's advice: Do not grow old.—Chicago Times.

A Deduction.

A little girl 3 years old has a way of deduction which is quite unique. Going into the kitchen, she was surprised to see the lid of the teakettle lift itself up and down. The cook told her it was steam, and she seemed satisfied. Several weeks after she was traveling by train, and seeing a locomotive in the depot, asked her mother what it was.

When told it was to draw the train, she wanted to know how, and the force of steam in the teakettle was recalled to her. The next day, while talking to a gentleman, she suddenly remarked:

"Do you know horses isn't pulling this train?"

"No," he said. "What is?"

"A dreat bid teatittle."—Harper's Bazar.

Didn't Want Him on the Free List.

"Perhaps if I had acted like Duffer, and abused the coffee, grumbled at the scarcity of butter, always been a month behind in pay, you would have married me?"

"Yes, perhaps I would. As it is I will marry Duffer."

"What!"

"Yes, I will marry Duffer. He needs some discipline. You are too good a boarder to have on the free list.

STRONG EVIDENCE.

Three Alleged White Cappers Have Been Arrested at Ottumwa, Iowa.

Considerable Evidence Against Them Already Secured by Detectives.

OTTUMWA, Iowa, Special Telegram, Feb. 16.—Three men are under arrest under the charge of being implicated in the white cap outrage, which has so aroused the farming population of this county. Lish King, William Penrod and Fletcher McCloskey were arrested charged with being the perpetrators of the crime.

The statute fixes the bond for such offenses at $1,000, and McCloskey was the only one able to give it, the other two being compelled to go to jail. When friends of King went to his father to get him to go the son's bond the old gentleman made the reply, "I won't go a dollar on it." A number of additional facts have been ascertained by Detective Donaldson, and it is thought that a very strong case will be presented. As the lightest penalty for the offense is ten years' imprisonment, no little excitement is being created.

A new factor in the case is a letter dated "Agency, Jan. 23," and sent to Mabey Morson, supposed to be intended for Morris at Ottumwa. No one called for the letter here and it was advertised, getting into the officers' hands to-day. The letter is as follows:

> Agency, Iowa, Jan. 23.—Mr. Mabey Morson: You are hereby warned to get out of the neighborhood within three days after receiving this note. If you do not you will be whitecapped without mercy. Take warning.

It is now believed that a good many people are implicated in the crime.

SERIOUS CHARGES.

County Officials at Ashland Publicly Denounced as Rascals.

ASHLAND, Wis., Special Telegram, Feb. 16.—The Daily News makes grave charges against Ed Fennelly, county clerk, and Harry L. Besse, chairman of the county board and lately appointed register of the local land office. The News alleges that Besse and Fennelly, the former a Republican, the latter a Democrat, have conspired to defraud the county out of many thousands of dollars.

The facts are cited in detail in support of the charges and a demand made upon Judge Parish to summon the grand jury to investigate the corruption among the officials. A taxpayers' league is being formed to assist in the prosecution of the alleged criminals, and the matter will not be allowed to rest until they are prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

Small but Numerous.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 16—Senator Power of Montana has recovered from his illness so that he was able to appear in the senate to-day for the first time in two or three weeks.

Senator Pettigrew's bill amending the land laws allowing stone lands to be taken under the placer mining has been favorably reported in the senate, and will probably pass that body in a few days.

Senator Davis introduced petitions from the St. Paul chamber of commerce recommending the liberal appropriation for the improvement of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers.

Minnesota postoffices established: Lerdal, Freeborn county, Jenso Share, postmaster. Manderson, Morrison county, W. Hansen Mis eldt, postmaster.

The National German-American Bank of St. Paul and the First National Bank of Minneapolis have been approved as reserve agents of the Merchants' National of Devils Lake, N. D., and the German-American of St. Paul for the American National of Helena.

Charles A. Pillsbury arrived in Washington to-night, and will probably give his views of the Washburn option bill before the senate committee to-morrow.

Speaker Kerr is again indisposed, and Mr. McKillin has been designated by him speaker pro tem.

The house passed a bill to establish lineal promotions in the army.

The senate passed the bill appropriating $350,000 for a dry dock near Algiers, La.

Counts on the Archbishop.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 16.—Agent Murphy at Fort Berthold denies the statement sent out from Washington relative to the requests that were said to have been made by Senator Hansbrough of him, asking him to apologize for some action he had taken previously in North Dakota politics. Mr. Murphy says there is nothing to this whatever; that Hansbrough has never made any such request of him, and that he was not making a fight on the senator. It seems that Murphy is not afraid of being bounced from his position as Indian agent, because, as he claims, he has the support of Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul, and if the commissioner or secretary should remove him the archbishop would carry his case to the president in his favor.

Killed Instantly.

TRACY, Minn., Special, Feb. 16.—William Lawer of Lamberton met with a sudden death in the railroad yard at this place Saturday night. It is supposed he stepped from the main track over to the side track to avoid a coming switch engine and was caught by a car being run down on the side track. The car passed over his body, killing him almost instantly. He leaves a wife and one child.

Election of Senators.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16.—The house committee on the election of president, vice president and representatives in congress to-day agreed to report a bill leaving the election of senators to the people and conferring exclusive power on the state legislatures to fix the time, place and manner of holding such elections.

En Route for Russia.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 16.—Charles McC. Reeve of Minneapolis has arrived in Washington and to-morrow will go to the state department with Senator Washburn and secure passports for himself and other members of the committee which will go to Russia to distribute the charity which the Northwestern people have contributed for the Russian famine sufferers.

Rather Discouraging.

LONDON, Feb. 16.—The Globe says that the prospects of foreign co-operation in the Chicago Columbian exhibition do not appear very bright.

"In the case of England," the Globe adds, "the very grave feeling against the McKinley bill has not yet subsided, but it is to be hoped that manufacturers will not let their feelings overcome their prudent judgment. Furthermore, such an attempt at retaliation is more likely to hurt themselves than any one else. The Americans and Germans are strenuously trying to take our commerce. The absence of British competitors at the fair would therefore be regarded more as a benefit than otherwise; it would also be regarded as an admittance of defeat."

TROUBLED MEXICO.

A Great Revolution Brewing—Shocking Condition of the Church.

MONTEREY, Mexico, Feb. 16.—Mexico is just now apparently on the verge of a revolution or civil war. True, the Garza affair appears to be but a fiasco, but there is a great power behind it, and one, too, which has not yet been definitely ascertained.

The forces recruited by Garza on this side have disbanded. The trouble is not begun yet, however, as the alleged election for president will take place in April, and then the real revolution will occur, if a leader can be secured.

After Sandoval was acquitted of violating the neutrality laws by the federal court in San Antonio he returned to Laredo, and he, Garza and a third party concocted the plan to get up the revolution. Instead of making a bold stroke, Garza dilly-dallied until he was hemmed in on the Mexican side, and was being pursued by troops on the American side. After four months of this silly kind of warfare, he has wisely concluded to at least temporarily suspend operations until spring. By that time, it is expected, hostilities will begin in the interior, and thus, when troops on the border will be recalled, at the head of 1,000 men he can cross over and join forces with the revolutionary army.

American and English speaking foreigners are all friends to Diaz, the only progressive president the republic has had. Instead of his being assisted by the church it has been his opponent. The church in Mexico is opposed to all enlightenment of the people. The clergy fight all improvements. They want no railways or telegraphs, and when Diaz adopted a system of compulsory education the war began in earnest. Diaz was determined, however, and he retaliated by closing up the convents and prohibiting the establishment of monasteries. Being opposed in his efforts at reform and defied by the priests, he put hundreds of them in Puebla in jail and prohibited the ringing of church bells in certain localities. He forcibly impressed on them the fact that he was running Mexico, not they. He gave them to understand that his idea of Christianity was that priests should preach Christ crucified, and not revolution and infraction of the law.

Priests here keep mistresses with impunity. From a church to a gambling table is but a step, and the priests gamble with the rest. The rentals of houses of ill-fame, of gambling houses, of bull pens, all go to a church which is supposed to teach religion. Because Diaz, a Catholic himself, will not tolerate such crime under the guise of religion, he is fought by the church and is the recipient of their anathemas. The clerical party, as they see all these privileges being swept away, will cheerfully contribute the sinews of war, with which to carry on a revolution against Diaz.

There is no such thing as an election in this republic. There are no booths or polling places open, and no one votes. The boxes are distributed in a few localities, and those in charge are instructed in advance how the vote must be counted. Not only does Diaz re-elect himself in this way, but he dictates whom he desires elected to all other offices in the different states. In fact, Diaz is king.

RESISTED COERCION.

A Girl Runs Away Because She Doesn't Want to Be a Catholic.

NEW YORK, Feb. 16.—Maud Hellman of San Francisco is a runaway daughter. She is eighteen years old. Last November she secured from her mother $1,75) and two days later disappeared. She came to this city, stopping a few days with a relative and then disappeared again. Her last disappearance was on Dec. 2 and she has not been seen since by her friends, though her sister, Mrs. M. P. Dolan of this city, has made diligent search for her.

Miss Helman is tall, with brown hair and a very erect carriage. She is not handsome, but is quite attractive. One of the causes of her disappearance was the efforts of her mother to induce the girl to become a Catholic. She was placed in a Catholic institution, but rebelled against the restraint. Afterward, being given an interest in real estate, she demanded her share of her mother, who gave her the above sum. The girl purchased a wardrobe and hastened to this city. Mrs. Dolan, her sister, followed her, but Maud heard of it, and again disappeared from the place where she was staying. She was traced to the Children's Aid society, where she remained a short time. Her mother will come on from San Francisco to join in the search.

ATTACKING AN ACT.

A Move to Test the Constitutionality of the Administrative Bill.

CHICAGO, Feb. 16.—The constitutionality of the McKinley administrative act is to be attacked. The first move was made in the United States circuit here to-day by the filing of a motion to dismiss the appeal of Collector Clark from a decision of the board of general appraisers assessing certain duties on dress goods belonging to Locke, Huleatt & Co. The motion is on the ground that the administrative act is void, and a number of technical points are raised in support of the position taken.

Success would mean that the present board of general appraisers would be abolished and the administrative act of 1833 be revived. The attorneys interested assert that the present statute is burdensome on importers and its machinery too complicated.

GOING TO MEXICO.

The Louisiana Lottery Will Move to the Neighboring Republic.

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 16.—At last the true secret of the withdrawal of the Louisiana State lottery from the fierce political struggle which has been raging for many months is out. The lottery is to go to Mexico. Arrangements to that end have about been completed with President Diaz, and the Fortress of Chapultepec will be the location of the Louisiana lottery after 1893.

To Improve the Mississippi.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16.—A bill appropriating $15,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi river, from the passes to the mouth of the Illinois river, was reported to the senate and placed on the calendar. The improvements above the mouth of the Illinois are to be relegated to the river and harbor bill, while the improvements contemplated by the bill reported are to be excluded from the river and harbor bill.

Wants to Be a Delegate.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 16.—Representative Lind to-day introduced Frank A. Day to Tom Reed as his successor, saying that the people of Minnesota were talking of sending Mr. Day to congress. Mr. Day says that he is not in any sense a candidate. What Day really wants is to go as a delegate to the Republican national convention, and he has been conferring with Minnesota politicians with that end in view. It is expected that neither of the senators or Representative Lind, the Republicans now in congress from Minnesota, will make any objection to Mr. Day's ambition in this direction, as he has always heartily supported all of them when they were candidates.

BREVITIES.

Wheat is 68 cents.

Considerable wood is being marketed here here this winter.

Ole Wiste went down to Crookston to-day to look after Emil Holmes.

W, E. Kelsey' the Crookston collector, was in town last week on business.

If you want to insure your buildings against fire, call at this office.

Several boys from here attended a dance at Thief River Falls last evening,

The flour mill has shut down for a few days this week to make seme repairs.

We learn that there will be a dance in the hall next Saturday night. All are invited to attend.

Tollef Thompson was made doubly happy last week by the arrival of a pair of twins at his place.

The weather has been considerable colder the past week and business has been slack in consequence.

George Ossman has been in town this week buying hides and furs. He does considerable business here.

Many are still of the opinion that fully one-half of the wheat in this part of the country is still to be marketed.

We understand that Meehan Bros. are negotiating to sell out their mills and logs at Red Lake Falls and Thief River Falls.

Wheat has been coming in rather slowly the past week. The farmers are evidently determined to hold for higher prices,

A number of the young folks of the village are contemplating going to Red Lake Falls to attend the dance next Monday night.

Mrs. C. E. Whaley has been quite sick the past week. Dr. Grundy of Thief River Falls was called last Friday and the patient is now recovering slowly.

The coming spring election is not causing much comment at present. Candidates for the various village offices seem to be slow about announcing themselves.

Wheat has been on the raise the past week and it looks now as if the farmers might realize a fair price before spring. We would advise selling at from 75 to 80 cents, however.

E. M. Hoff returned last Friday from Lyle Mower Co. Minn., where he had been to attend the funeral of his father-in-law. Mrs, Hoff will not return for several weeks,

Mrs. E. T. Morgan left on to-day's train for Langdon N. D., in response to a telegram stating that her son-in-law Mr. Blakely had died very suddenly of heart disease.

Emil Holmes is, we learn, very sick at the Commercial Hotel at Crookston He was feeling badly last week and went to Crookston on Friday and has been confined to his bed ever since.

O. W. Brink returned last week from the southern part of the state with a carload of horses and has already sold them all. He will go back next week after another car load.

The Great Northern Express Company has been organized and will commence business about May 1st. It will succeed the American Express Co. here It is not known whether the change will affect the rates.

How are you fixed for insurance? Cold weather is coming on and you should protect your property against fire. Call at this office for rates. Remember that we can give you just as low a rate as anyone and give you your choice of several first class companies.

Persons visiting their old homes in the East this winter should take along printed matter descriptive of their new homes in the Northwest, Take copies of this paper with you and ask agents of the Great Northern Railway for a supply of publications.

Crookston Times: Charlie Rapp came down from St. Hilaire last evening and is around to-day showing off one of the finest mink coats we have seen this season, Mr, Rapp and wife are making preparations for an extensive European trip and expect to start from here in about two weeks. Charlie will return in about three months but his wife expects to remain about a year.

Two months have gone by since congress assembled yet nothing has been done. The house is drifting like a derelict and the overwhelming democratic majority seems to be suffering a sort of paralysis. There is no real plan of action; there is no unity of purpose; certainly there is nothing resembling capable leadership.

Mr. Mills is sulking, Mr. Springer is nerveless, the senatorial "combine"—Hill, Brice and Gorman—is confusing counsel and plotting a retreat from the former position of revenue reform, and the silver enthusiasts are threatening to split the democratic party wide open with a free coinage bill that is in direct conflict with democratic priciples.

What the outcome is going to be it is impossible to say. The present pomise is not very flattering, and the chances are that faction will continue to cripple the majority and conspire to defeat the great reform, which it was to accomplish —Chicago News.

About the only argument that the friends of the forestry bring forward in behalf of the proposed forest reserve in in Minnesota is that the forests are needed to keep up the flow of the rivers. The weakness of this argument is apparent to every man familiar with the forests of Minnesota, as most of the lumbermen are. The cut of the pine does not denude the land but unless the soil is particularly light. brings up a denser growth of poplars, oak and other deciduous trees. The soil upon which pines grow is not fit for farming and will not be cleared when the lumbermen have left it. In our great forest region, however. there are many strips of hard-wood land which will make good farms when cleared and these will be settled very soon, now that railways are advancing into the region. There are also strips of fine alluvial prairie said to be fertile as the lands of the Red River Valley, and the region in question contains the newly-discovered iron deposits of the Mesaba range, which probably exceed in extent those of the Vermillion range, The sentiment of the people of Minnesota is so unmistakably against the setting aside of the reserve that the the president can hardly undertake it. —Lumberman.

Ignatius Donnelly's fine Italian hand is likely to show itself in Seventh Congressional district politics this year. It is well known that Senator Hompe, of Otter Tail county is seeking the Alliance nomination from that district, and that when the district was created it was so arranged that he, as an Alliance candidate would have no trouble in being elected, Hompe has been an indefatigable opposer of Donnelly in everything the latter has had the nerve to ask for —and that has been nearly the earth— and while the Sage has paid but little or no attention to the Otter Tail man's machinations, it is now understood that he will, by way of retaliation, oppose Mr. Hompe for the Seventh Congressional district nomination—and by this opposing, end him. The gentleman decided upon to lead the knights of the opposition is claimed to be Andrew Steenerson, of Polk county, brother of Halvor Steenerson, the Crookston lawyer. Andrew Steenerson has been prominent in Alliance and People's party movements, and is known to be a devout follower of Mr, Donnelly. He is a power in his county and district, and should he consent to run for the nomination, would be the cause of making matters exceedingly interesting for the Otter Tail Statesman.

Wm, Wylie, the postmaster and one of the town officers at Wylie in this county, arrived in this city last evening having in charge a young man named John White whom he had found in a straw stack a short distance from his farm almost frozen to death and about to be devoured by wolves.

Mr, Wylie brought the man down with the intention of having him placed in the hospital but as that institution was not yet ready to receive patients he was left at the Sherman House where he is now receiving medical attention.

A Times reporter saw Mr. Wylie after he had made his charge as comfortable as possible and obtained from him the following statement concerning the matter, "I found White in the straw stack about 10 o'clock yesterday morning. The evening before my attention had been called to the stack by seeing a lot of wolves prowling around it. I did not pay much attention to them at the time but I could hear them barking all night long and I determined in the morning to go over and get a shot at them. I hitched my team up about 10 o'clock and drove over. I found the snow all around the stack trodden down by the wolves and this was what first excited my suspicions that there was something in the stack they were after, An examination soon revealed that my surmises were correct. White was lying partly covered by the straw and I first thought he was dead but soon found that life still lingered and at once put him in the sleigh and took him home. His hands and feet were badly frozen and within another hour, perhaps, he would have been devoured by the wolves They had approached within four or five feet of him when I arrived, When I got White home everything possible was done to bring him around and draw the frost from his frozen limbs. When this was done I had just time to catch the train and bring him here."

Dr. Watts examined the patient last evening and says he hopes to be able to save his feet and hands although it is probable he will lose some of his toes.

White is a young man who came here last summer from Iowa where he has relatives. He has been working with a threshing crew. When questioned as to how he happened to be in the stack he said he was helping one of the farmers to haul hay. After they had put on a load he started to walk home ahead of the team, and after going as far as the straw stacks he sat down to wait for the team. He soon fell asleep and his friends drove by without noticing him. He remained in the stack three days and four nights, and were it not for the fact that the weather was unusually mild and that he was discovered just in time no one would ever have known what became of him.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

A doll dressed by Rosina Vokes in San Francisco has been sold for $100.

Jay Gould and his daughter-in-law, Edith Kingdon Gould, who used to be an actress, are often seen together in New York theaters.

The Christmas number of The Dramatic News weighs a pound and a half. It has eighty-four pages and $12,000 worth of advertising.

The mental and physical collapse of W. J. Scanlan called out more than 500 letters and telegrams of regret to his manager, Augustus Pitou.

Paderewski, the pianist, is described as resembling "the portrait of Shelley with the hair of Swinburne added and the intense expression of Sarah Bernhardt."

It is said that Augustus Thomas' play "Alabama" will soon be acted in London. There will be no changes made in the American version, and all the actors will be Americans.

A baggage car containing every piece of scenery and every costume of the "A Fair Rebel" company was recently burned. The company had to suspend business for a month.

Providence is the oldest theater town in the United States. George O. Willard, the well known journalist of that city, has written a history of the Providence stage from 1762 to 1891.

Miss Annie Ward Tiffany has recently purchased a handsome summer residence at Buzzard's Bay, Mass., near the house of Joseph Jefferson. The only female Irish star is evidently making money.

Blind Tom, the negro musical genius, is not "passing his last days in an insane asylum." The rumor is contradicted by acquaintances of Tom's manager. At a very recent date the eccentric negro was traveling and performing with all his old vigor.

"The Factory Bell" is the title of a melodrama in five acts by James Gorman, of minstrel fame, which will be produced late in the season. All the scenes are said to be sensational. The most striking is the revolving scene showing the exterior and interior of a cotton mill, with machinery in motion.

TURF TOPICS.

Out in California they allude to the Electioneer characteristics of stepping as the "golden gait."

Musket, mainly due to Carbine's brilliant performance, heads the list of winning sires in Australia with twenty-four races.

The world's stallion record in 1834 was 2:42½, held by Andrew Jackson. In the year 1891 a 2-year-old stallion trotted in 2:10¾.

When Maud S trotted 2:08¾ at Cleveland she weighed 942 pounds. Sunol weighed 1,070 pounds when she trotted in 2:08¼ recently.

The first important 3-year-old event of 1892 is the Tennessee Derby, to be run at the Memphis spring meeting, which begins April 11.

The value of Sunol is variously estimated at from $50,000 to $500,000. Mr. Bonner, her owner, says that a half million would not take her.

The once great Tournament, who cost Foxhall Keene $35,000, is said to be suffering with hip trouble and may never again be seen at the post.

A California journalist believes the Stockton track as much faster than the Independence track as that track is faster than the Grand circuit courses.

It has been definitely decided to hold a horse show in Philadelphia, which will commence on May 30 and continue for two days. The exhibition will be in a large inclosed ground at Wissahickon Station.

Dewey, the equine artist, has been at Willow Lawn farm, Waverly, Ia., engaged upon a large painting of Abe Downing, 2:20¼, and his fast sons, Pat Downing, 2:13; Pennant, 2:15, and Chronometer, 2:15.

Marcus Daly, the Montana copper king, has made a contract with H. H. Cross, the animal painter, to put the Missoula county farm and several of his fast horses on canvas. Daly will pay $3,000 for his art work.

WHISPERS ABOUT WOMEN.

Mrs. K. B. Henry and Miss Bertha E. Simmons are New York drummers.

Mrs. William H. Haberle, of Syracuse, a Long Branch belle of last season, is one of the most beautiful women of central New York.

Mme. Carnot's (wife of the French president) dinners cost $10 a plate, and a ball is given by her at an expense of $7,000. At these balls sometimes 1,000 bottles of champagne are consumed, in addition to other wines and liqueurs.

Miss Fannie M. Stevens, of Freeport, Ills., claims to be the first woman court reporter and to have been appointed in 1887, two years before Miss Haddix was appointed. Miss Stevens is only twenty-two years old, but she is very expert in her profession.

Victoria Jeans, a girl graduate of England, just past twenty, won the Cobden club prize of $300 offered in rotation at Oxford, Cambridge and other universities. The subject set by the club for competition was "The fundamental and commercial effects, actual and perspective, of English factory legislation."

M. H. De Young, the California national committeeman, never travels without Mrs. De Young, and she has attended the last two national conventions. For herself she does not care at all for politics, but never fails to grow enthusiastic when Mr. De Young is interested. She is a pretty blond with dark eyes, very popular in California, and is entirely American in everything.

CHATS ABOUT MEN.

Bishop Butler, of England, believed in the immortality of animals.

Mr. Blaine's grandchildren, the Coppinger boys, are named respectively Blaine and Carnegie.

Captain J. Wall Wilson, a survivor of the Kane arctic expedition, is hale and hearty, despite the loss of a toe in the ice.

A grandson of Professor S. F. B. Morse, the father of the telegraph, lives in Wyandotte, one of the suburbs of Kansas City. He is his grandfather's namesake and possesses many valuable relics of the inventor.

Governor Brown, of Maryland, lives on a farm that once belonged to the family of Pattersons from which Jerome Bonaparte took his wife. Mr. Brown has a great deal of choice live stock, especially Devon cattle. He also breeds and trains horses.

Captain Jack Crawford, the poet-scout, is a most interesting character. He has been in the service of the government since 1863, when, as a boy of fifteen, he enlisted in the army. His muscular form and erect, military bearing make him conspicuous everywhere.

Speaker Crisp is the thirty-second presiding officer of the house of representatives. There have been fifty-two congresses, but only thirty-one speakers. Henry Clay was elected to the office six times, and Blaine, Colfax, Randall, Carlisle and Nathaniel Macon three times each.

Mr. Goschen, the chancellor of the British exchequer, is said to be the ablest debater in parliament. Nevertheless, he is devoid of gesture and his voice is like the hoarse croak of a crow. His head is covered by a peculiar sort of glossy gray hair, and one of his eyes is defective.

Senator Stanford has acquired the reputation of giving some of the finest dinners in Washington. To grace his table on such occasions he patriotically imports everything he can from California, including flowers and greens, rare fruits, such as cherries in midwinter and kegs of choice nuts.

RAILROAD JOTTINGS.

The Rock Island has decided to build south from Indian Territory to the gulf.

Some of the London and Northwestern (Eng.) railway engines run 2,000 miles a week regularly.

The Rockaway Valley road has secured the entire right of way between Mendham, N. J., and Morristown.

It is probable that the Bay of Quinte road will be extended in the near future so as to connect with the Thousand Island railroad.

The survey for the railroad from Mombassa, on the east African coast, to the lakes in the territories of the British East Africa company is to be begun at once.

A national sleeping car company has been formed by St. Petersburg capitalists to introduce cars of the American style on the Russian railroads. A number of such cars have been ordered at the Putilovski factories.

The Chicago and Eastern Illinois Shelbyville extension is completed, and trains are running from Tuscala. An important feature of the extension is that it forms a new route between Chicago and St. Louis through its connection with the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis road at Shelbyville. The line is thirty-seven miles long.

The Pennsylvania company has abandoned the old passenger station at Trenton and in its place opened the handsome one completed on the north side of the yard. The new station is of the Queen Anne style of architecture. It is made of buff brick and Indiana limestone, with a profusion of terra cotta panels. The station ranks among the handsome structures of the state and cost $100,000.

King Milan has been appointed to the chief command of the Persian cavalry.

Dom Pedro's daughter says she is ready to return to Brazil as soon as the people call her.

The king of Italy is a more than ordinarily good "gun." His favorite sport is antelope shooting.

William II loves homely fare. He insists on having on his table every Thursday a dish of mashed peas, smoked beef and sauerkraut, to be eaten together.

The room which Queen Victoria occupies as a sleeping chamber in Buckingham palace is furnished in the plainest manner and has as little furniture in it as possible.

The father of Princess Mary of Teck, who by her alliance with Prince Albert Victor may some day become queen of England, was once irreverently known on account of his impecuniosity as the Duke of Tick.

The new king of Wurtemburg, William II, continues his imitations of his illustrious colleague and namesake, the kaiser. The king has discharged every official connected with the Royal Court theater who does not happen to be of noble birth and has given their positions to men of title.

ODDS AND ENDS.

The new two dollar certificates bear an excellent portrait of the late Secretary Windom.

In Europe red hair is associated with deceitfulness. A German proverb printed in 1512 says, "The short in stature are naturally proud: the red haired are untrustworthy."

Æsop's Fables were not written by their author. They were related and handed down until the Fourteenth century, when they were collected and published by a monk.

The florin, one of the most famous of modern coins, originated in France. It was called "florin," however, not from the name of the city, but from the fact that it had on it a flower-de-luce.

Became So After Hearing Him.

Gentleman (in the cars)—This is a very pretty village.

More to His Taste.

Miss Elder (literary)—Do you like "Crabbe's Tales," Mr. Hojack?

Here It Is.

To the man who labors with his hands, physical trouble is a very serious thing. It is not merely the pain he endures, racking and tormenting as it is, but the prospective loss of time, money and place haunts him and aggravates his suffering. He is bent on having prompt relief and sure cure. He wants the best and the proof and here it is: —Mr. W. H. Schroeder, Gilbertville, Iowa, stated April 10, 1884, that he had used St. Jacobs Oil in his stables for horse complaints and upon himself for rheumatism, and had found it the best remedy he had ever tried. Again Feb'y 11, 1887, he writes: "I have used St. Jacobs Oil for rheumatism and sore back, as stated, and it cured; and for burns and bruises it does its work as recommended to do. I always keep it in the house and recommend it to my neighbors." —Mr. John Garbutt, 656 Minna St. San Francisco, Cal., writes: "Some time back I sprained my knee and suffered agony until I tried St. Jacobs Oil. The result was a speedy and permanent cure." —Miss Ida M. Fleming, 7 S. Carey St., Baltimore, Md., says: "I had been afflicted for two years with neuralgia, and tried every means to get rid of the tormenting disease. I had been given so much quinine that my nervous system was seriously injured. I was advised to use St. Jacob's Oil, which I did, and it relieved me entirely.

THE LADIES.

The pleasant effect and perfect safety with which ladies may use the California liquid laxative Syrup of Figs, under all conditions, make it their favorite remedy. To get the true and genuine article, look for the name of the California Fig Syrup Co., printed near the bottom of the package.

A bar in the river and a bar on shore have the same name, because water is scarce in both places.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials. Address,

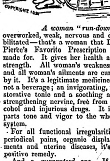
The Only One Ever Printed.

Can you find the word? There is a 3 inch display advertisement in this paper, this week, which has no two words alike except one word. The same is true of each new one appearing each week, from The Dr. Harter Medicine Co. This house places a "Crescent" on everything they make and publish. Look for it, send them the name of the word and they will return you book, beautiful lithographs or samples free.

The cold wave appears to have arrived in unbroken packages.



A woman "run-down," overworked, weak, nervous and debilitated—that's a woman that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is made for. It gives her health and strength. All woman's weaknesses and all woman's ailments are cured by it. It's a legitimate medicine—not a beverage; an invigorating, restorative tonic and a soothing and strengthening nervine, free from alcohol and injurious drugs. It imparts tone and vigor to the whole system.

For all functional irregularities, periodical pains, organic displacements and uterine diseases, it's a positive remedy.

And a guaranteed one. If it doesn't give satisfaction, in every case, the money paid for it is refunded. No other medicine for women is sold on these terms. That's because nothing else is "just as good." Perhaps the dealer will offer something that's "better." He means that it's better for him.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH FOR A DAY.

"Why, then, all of a sudden, without any provocation from us at all, he broke out quite savage, and said he didn't care if we were both dead the next minute, and frightened me and his uncle terribly, and then burst away and ran out of the house," said Mrs. Molly, quite unconscious of the exaggeration of her statement, which put so different a face upon the scene she attempted to describe.

"Dear, dear, how shocking! And you witnessed this strange behavior, Mr. Morriss?' said the doctor, appealing to old John.

"Yes; though so little did I then suspect that the poor lad's wits were leaving him, that I got angry and said how I would cut him off with a shilling!"

"And yet you might have known it, John, for he never did behave so before, and his attack on us was quite unprovoked," said Mrs. Molly.

"True, true, all true," groaned poor old John.

"Well, now, Mr. Black, will you tell us—"

"If you please, sir, I should like to be questioned, as I believe'ow I was the next person as saw Mr. Joseph Morriss hafter 'e left 'is huncle's 'ouse."

"Oh! and who are you my good woman?" inquired the doctor.

"Hi'm Miss Robinson, and as I was in town this hevening to 'ear Mr. Sturm, I 'appened also to 'ear what was going on at the 'ouse, and thought 'ow I would come in and give my own hevivence.'

"And what do you know of the affair, Mrs.——, Mrs.——?"

"Miss—and Robinson, sir: that's my name, Miss Robinson."

"Well what can you tell us of Mr. Morriss's deportment to-day, Miss Robinson?"

"Well, sir, I met 'im as I was coming out of Black's, and 'e was going 'hin. And 'is conduct was most hodd."

"In what respect, Miss Robinson?"

"Why, sir, it was most heccentric."

"How?"

"Well, sir, most hextraordinary."

"You must be more explicit, Miss Robinson. Tell me what he said or did."

"Well, sir, first—'e ran against me with all 'is force, and butted me in the breast, which I would 'ave hoverlooked if it 'adn't been for the rest?"

"What else?"

"'E talked in the most hextra-vagant way, sir; 'e said 'ow my bonnet was too young for such an hold woman, too light for such an 'eavy woman, and too helegant for hany lady's-maid; which it stands to reason, sir, 'e must have been very much hintoxified, which, as it was early the morning, 'e could not 'ave been, or helse 'e was very mad to have thought such things of my bonnet and me!"

"Hump, I should take this statement as strong rebutting testimony against the charge of insanity, if I did not know from experience that madmen often have a great deal of malicious wit," said the doctor, in a low voice, turning to old John Morriss. Then resuming his examination of Miss Robinson, he asked—

"Anything else?"

"Yes, sir, 'e called me a stout, hold, waiting-woman—hover-dressed! w'ich you'll hadmit, doctor, for saying that 'e hought to 'ave the shower waistcoat and straight bath administered, and not to be hallowed to go about hinsulting people with 'is hexcentricities."

"He will, probably, be restained, Miss Robinson! You may sit down now," said the doctor.

Miss Robinson withdrew, taking care to make an awful grimace at the bound victim as she passed him, as much as to say—

"Hif I can only get you into the mad 'ouse for calling me stout and 'eavy I'll do it!"

"And now, Mr. Black," said the doctor.

The senior partner of B. B. W. and G. came forward and said—

"I can only say that his conduct in our shop this morning was that of a man entirely bereft of his senses. It was altogether unlike his usual conduct. I had never seen anything like it before."

"Pray explain what he said and did."

"Well, sir, he drove away every customer from our shop! every one, sir, I do assure you, upon my honor."

"Shocking! I had no idea that he had broken out into such violence!"

"Violence! why, sir, when we attempted to expostulate with him and control him, he assailed us with the most awful abuse, called us cheats and swindlers and every other bad name that he could lay his tongue to!"

"Dear, dear me! how dreadful."

"Yes, sir, and finally he leaped upon his feet, cleared the counter at a single bound, and rushed into the street!"

"Good Heaven, how terrible! but had anything happened to excite or anger him?"

"Nothing whatever, sir; we were all upon the very best terms that morning."

"And what did the poor young man do next?"

"I really do not know," said Mr. Black, who, prepossessed now with the idea of Joseph's insanity, was probably quite unconscious of the gross misrepresentations in his statement.

"Please, your honor, it wur me as met the young gent fust after he run out of Black's," said the tramp, coming forward and pulling his forelock.

"Well, tell us all about it!"

"Vy, you see, zur, I vas standin near Black's, vaiting to open carriage doors for a penny, ven all of a sudden this young gent spins out of the door as if he had been pitched out; and he looks up and down the street wild as luny, and, sez he, 'Vat shall I do?' and then I made so bold to hint as to give a poor man a penny moight be about the right thing to do. And he answered how he didn't see it, and I was another, and served me right, and all such-like talk as had nothink to do with what I axed him. And then, zur, he went to moaning and complaining and bewailing hisself, 'acause he said he hadn't a wife and fifteen small children mostly twins, specially the three last; which your honor will own, no man, unless he was stark mad, would ever want, and which it is clear this young gent could not possibly a' had even if he'd got married at ten years old!"

"Well, well, never mind that! What next?"

"Why, he tossed me a crown, and made off with himself; and that was all I saw of him until I saw him in a raving-mad fit at the 'bus stand, and was called to help to take him—and a job we had of it. I'll never help to take a madman again. I'm bit in a dozen places at least; look here! and here! and here!" said the man, showing the wounds received in the conflict.

"Shocking! absolutely shocking!"

"Now, zur, as you're a medical man, I'll like you to tell me if it's dangerous, and if I'm like to go mad along of it; and if so be I am, I'd thank you to give me an anti—what's-its-name?—to stop it."

"You are not in any danger; the bite of a maniac does not cause hydrophobia like that of a rabid dog, so that you will not require an antidote. You may go."

The tramp did not 'go,' he was too much interested in the proceedings; but he withdrew to an obscure corner of the room, and stood watching the scene, quite unsuspicious of the gross exaggeration in his testimoney.

"Now, friends, if there is any one here who saw this unhappy young man in the next stage of his proceedings, I should like to hear their account of it said the doctor.

"Come, my poor darling, come! it is unpleasant, I know, but it's your bounden duty;" said Mrs. Molly, urging forward a young girl, whom she at length held up to the doctor, saying—"Here, doctor, this is Miss Bell, poor child; she saw Joseph early in the afternoon) they were to have been married soon, poor children, but Lord! Lord! who can tell what a day may bring forth!"

"How did Mr. Morriss appear when you saw him, my child?" inquired the doctor.

Lizzy had her face buried in her pocket-handkerchief, and was sobbing, or pretending to sob, as she answered—

"He came to see me at about one o'clock this afternoon, and he behaved most cruel, violent, and insulting to me!"

"Tell me, my dear, what he did and said?"

"He frowned at me, and stared at me horribly—enough to scare me out of my wits, and he called me a perfect fright, and a regular devil!"

This was Lizzy's translation of the mild and truthful phrases 'not a beauty,' and 'by no means an angel.' But Miss Lizzy was fortunately not upon her oath.

"And what else, my dear?"

"Oh, a great deal more of the same sort. And please don't ask me any more, it was so dreadful it nearly frightened me to death! and now I hope nobody will expect me to keep my engagement and marry a madman, because I can't do it!" sobbed Lizzy.

"Certainly not, my dear child! at least, not at present," said the benevolent doctor, who was too much impressed by Miss Lizzie's infantile beauty to perceive her heartlessness.

"No, neither now nor in the future! I want that distinctly understood, for I think that when an engagement is broken off, especially with a madman, it had better never be renewed," said the selfish and cautious Lizzy.

"Yes, my darling; it shall be just as you say. Poor thing! she is so frightened and upset by all this, that she doesn't know what she is talking about," said Mrs. Morriss, leading her away.

"Yes, but I do know what I am talking about; and I want everybody concerned to understand that the engagement is forever at an end," persisted Lizzy.

"Well, well, my dear, we will talk of that some other time, when you are yourself, you know," answered Mrs. Morriss, who could not be made to recognize Lizzy Bell's utter selfishness.

"And, now, sir," said old John to the doctor, "You have heard all that we know; what do you think? He seems quieter now; and mightn't we venture to keep him here to-night? I hardly like to turn the poor fellow out again to-day."

"I fear," replied the doctor, "that it is the mere quietude of mental and physical exhaustion. I fear that when his strength returns he may break out into a fury again."

"Oh, yes, doctor, to be sure 'e will! Hi know something of madness myself, 'aving 'ad several nice young men go raving mad hupon my account. Don't you trust him, Mr. John. Hit's all 'is hart to deceive you. Madmen are wonderful cunning; 'e might burst loose, and break hall your 'eads, and set the 'ause on fire!" said Miss Robinson, who had no idea of having any indulgence granted to this victim.

"Oh, John, so he might! and then finish up by jumping into the river, poor innocent! It's very painful, John; but indeed I'm afraid he had better be sent away tonight. The doctor knows a nice place kept by a friend of his, where the poor boy might be taken care of for a few days, until we can see what to do with him," said Mrs. Morriss, weeping. "What do you think, doctor?"

"I think it would be the only safe plan."

"Then the sooner it is done the better. Will somebody run and call a cab?" inquired Mr. John Morriss, giving a terrified glance towards Joseph, who, notwithstanding the fact that his hands and feet were tightly bound, had managed, by the violent wriggling of his body, to raise himself in a sitting posture upon the sofa, where he remained, glaring round upon the company.

"Oh, lors! his fit is coming on again! Run—run somebody, for a cab, and let us get him off before he does mischief!" cried Mrs. Morriss.

The tramp started on the errand, but as he opened the door, he stepped back to make way for two visitors, who had entered the hall unannounced, but whom he heralded as—

"Another lady and gemman as knows summut about somethin'!"

And Helen Lyle and Harry Blewitt entered the room.

Joseph Moriss made a bound to meet his betrothed, but he was immediately seized and held down by the doctor and Mr. John.

Harry Blewitt made a circular bow to the assembled company, and then addressing the mistress of the house, said—

"Mrs. Morriss, I hope you will permit me to explain the reason of my present intrusion. The fact is that the omnibus-driver who brought my friend Joseph up to the City went back to Streatham with a terrible story of the furious madman, Mr. Joseph Morriss who was seized upon the moment he got out of the 'bus. This story, told among the cabmen, hostlers, and waiters of the Crown and Sceptre, was heard by Miss Lyle's footman, who had gone there for his evening's beer, and in this manner reached the ears of Miss Lyle herself, who, believing that some great injustice must have been perpetrated, ordered her horses and drove to town. She did me the honor to call at my lodgings, and request me to attend her hither. Her requests had all the force of commands, and I came here with pleasure, especially as I happen to possess the key of Morriss's insanity. But first permit me to attend to my friend."

And after disposing Helen Lyle in an arm-chair, Blewitt drew a penknife from his pocket, opened it, advanced towards Joseph Morriss, and before the astounded company suspected his intention, he had cut the cords that bound the captive, and set him upon his feet.

"What are you about?" cried the doctor.

"He is mad!" exclaimed Mr. John.

"Furious!" cried Mrs. Morriss.

"He'll do mischief!" said the doctor.

"He'll hurt some one!" said Mr. John.

"He'll drown himself," wept Mrs. Morriss.

"'E'll break hall our 'eads, and set the 'ouse on fire!" shrieked Miss Robinson, doubling the uproar, while everyone shrank away to distant parts of the room to get as far as possible from the loose madman.

"He'll do nothing of the sort. The only harm he is likely to do you will be to prosecute the whole lot of you for assault, and afterwards sue you for slander! Mr. Morriss, your nephew is no more mad than you or I!"

"You know nothing about it, sir! He is as mad as a March hare!"

"On the contrary, I know all about it, as I will soon prove to you. It is now just ten o'clock," said Blewitt, taking out and consulting his watch, "consequently, it is just twenty-four hours since this time last evening when Joseph Morriss and myself were coming out of Mr. Sturm's chapel, after hearing that reverend gentleman's terrific sermon upon lying. Upon that occasion I laid a sort of wager with my friend Morriss that he could not speak the truth, even in answer to customary questions, for one day, without being turned off by his uncle, discharged by his employer, and discarded by his sweetheart; and, furthermore, that he could not continue to speak it for a week without getting into the lunatic asylum. Joseph Morriss, was not this our compact?"

"Yes," said Joseph, "it was."

"The experiment has succeeded beyond my utmost expectations, for I find that my friend has spoken the truth in answer to the simple common questions of the day for just fifteen hours, and the worst that I predicted has happened to him. Joseph Morriss, speak now, and answer for yourself."

"Yes," said Joseph, "to the simplest and most commonplace questions, I have mildly answered the truth only since seven o'clock this morning, and I have been subjected to extreme loss and degrading outrage. Uncle," he continued, turning to old John, "if you will candidly recall the scene of the morning, you will find it was very different from that which the fears of yourself and my aunt imagined and described. The worst I said was that I should not break my heart if you both should die——"

"Yes, Joseph, but you see, I thought by your saying that you meant a great deal more."

"That was because you were not accustomed to the hearing the simple truth!"

"Well, well, my boy, now I understand it all, I am sure I beg your pardon."

"No; say you forgive me, uncle! that is all I require."

"Very well, then, have it your own way! I am so glad that you are neither ungrateful nor mad—which is the same as saying that you are neither heartless nor brainless, that I am willing either to grant you my pardon or to beg yours!" said the old man, extending his hand to Joseph, who seized it and shook it warmly.

"Miss Robinson, I have no other defence to make to your accusation than this, that you appealed to my judgment as to the propriety of your dress, and I gave my opinion in all sincerity."

"You 'old your tongue!" retorted the abigail.

"Mr. Black, as to your statement, that I drove your customers from your shop, I have only to explain that I did so by telling them the truth as to the worthless quality and exaggerated prices of your goods. If this truth-telling has injured you, you have your remedy in a suit for damages against me; though I scarcely think you will care to make the matter so public!"

"You are beneath my notice, sir!" said Black, turning away.

"And you," said Joseph, turning to the tramp, "I told you no unpleasant truths; I did not hurt your feelings, or injure your business, and I scarcely expected to find you among my accusers."

"Lord bless your life zur, but you guv me a crown; and if that warn't just cause for me thinking you out of your senses, I don't know what was. Hows'over, I'm glad I was mistaken; and as you did know what you was a-doin' of ven' you guv me the crown, all I wish is that you may yourself be crowned with joy, and here's my hand upon it!" said the tramp.

"Thank you! And now Elizabeth Bell, as the charge that you have made against me is the most serious of all, I call upon you to at least modify it. The most offensive language that I used to you in answer to an observation that you made was simply to the effect that you were neither a perfect beauty nor a perfect angel—was it not?"

"Yes;" but that was equivalent to calling me a complete fright and something worse."

"No, Lizzy, it is not; it is only your habit of reckless assertion and inaccurate language that makes you say or think so. You need not be a fright because you are not a beauty, nor a——"

"Now, Mr. Morriss, you needn't try to make it up with me, because I won't do it!"

"Heaven forbid! and all that I beg of you now is, that you will be more sincere, with one that you like better, than ever you have been with me!" said Joseph, taking the hand of Lizzy and placing it in that of Henry Blewitt.

"And now, Helen—dear Helen! who took me up when all others abandoned me—what shall I say to you?"

"Why, to me, nothing now and here; but to your friends you may say that, as for speaking the truth for a day they have voted you to be a madman, they had better engage me as your keeper!"

THE END.

THE TAME JAY.

The Daily Life of This Bird of Sapretive Mischief.

Among the birds which my children raised this year is one which gives us more pleasure than I ever expected. It is the blue jay, and he is the most cunning plumed fellow you can think of. I had to clip his wings because he would not stay in a cage, but liked to hop and flutter about the house. He is not afraid of the dogs, but will hop around and about them, sit on the head of a big blood hound and yell at the top of his voice just for mischief.

He defies all the chickens if they try to take some food away from him. I suspect his terrible war cry scares them. He will sit on our shoulders and hands and beg for food, but as soon as his appetite is satisfied he takes what more is offered him and hides it away in some nook. Sometimes he will put it down in my vest pocket or under the collar of my outing shirt. Water, he likes exceedingly well, and shows signs of disgust if without his regular bath; and lo, how he will jump in when the dishpan is filled with fresh, cool liquid—drink, dive, splatter, and yell for joy! Then out he goes to the sunny lawn and lies down on one side first, spreading the opposite wing; then he turns over to spread and dry the other one. He will also take dry sun baths in the same manner.

If nobody is around he will perch on a chair on the porch and sing; and he can sing right well in a low voice, imitating other birds. His efforts to talk are also remarkable. Everybody in the house loves him, but we have to keep out of his reach everything that glitters and is not to heavy for his strength. This, of course, is the inherited vice of the corvine tribe and the only complaint I can raise against him. But, taking it all around, I can highly recommend to lovers of pet birds to raise a tame young blue jay, as it will certainly be a source of great pleasure to them.—Forest and Stream.

FEATHERS ON THE FARM.

Possible Profit in Saving and Carefully Curing Them.

If the feathers from all sources on the farm should be carefully cared for and sold they would amount to a neat little sum in the course of a year. While geese and duck feathers are preferable, yet there is a demand for chicken feathers, when properly assorted. In doing this the shorter and softer feathers should be put by themselves and cured either in the sun and air or by artificial heat. It is very necessary to cure the green feathers in order to keep them from spoiling at the quills and yielding a bad odor that might ruin the whole lot.

We priced some pillows to-day in a furnishing house and were considerably set back at the price asked for them. Three dollars for a couple of pillows that weighed only four pounds and the feathers were only second-class at that. The best quality of fresh home-grown, put up in factory at Nashville were quoted much higher. The first quotation was on pillows made in Chicago and simply guaranteed to emit no unpleasant odor. The feathers in them felt bunchy and harsh. Prime geese feathers bring 50 to 70 cents a pound. White or Pekin duck feathers sell nearly as high as geese feathers.

It strikes us that in a state as well watered as the State of California, where water fowl may have the advantages of the very best and most natural surroundings, it would pay to raise ducks and geese for their feathers and meat. The latter can certainly be sold at cost of production, which leave the feathers produced as clear profit.—Breeder and Horseman.

One Man Got the Report.

Five reporters of newspapers having been instructed to take verbatim reports of a speech by a celebrated member of Parliament, to be made in a neighboring town, left by a morning train for a junction station, where they hoped to catch another train bound for the scene of action. As they travelled along they entered into an agreement not to take any unfair advantage of one another, no matter what opportunity for doing so might present itself. They arrived at the junction too late for the connecting train, and were in a difficulty as to getting over the intervening dozen miles of country. They went prospecting—four thin scribes hurrying in advance of veritable Falstaff. At last, they espied an old fashioned wagon, drawn by a lean horse, and in a very few minutes the treacherous four were ensconced in the vehicle, filling it completely. In vain did the man of fat remind them of the agreement. His expostulations were received with derision, and the driver was ordered to start. The cheated reporter appealed to the countryman, offering to give two pounds for a seat on the dashboard. The offer was accepted, and the man slipped down to help him up.

"Stop!" whispered the reporter, "I'll buy your horse for ten pounds, cash down!"

"Done!" said the driver, and the gold was handed over.

"Now," said the owner of the horse, "take him out of the traces and help me on his back."

It was done, and the horse and rider were soon lost to view. Next day only one newspaper could give a full report of the speechifying at the meeting, and four belated journalists had a bad time of it with their respective editors.—Tit-Bits.

Clever Pigs.

Do newspapers always tell the truth? If they do, then some animals have an astonishing amount of intelligence. The Worcester Gazette says that a farmer has a sow and four well-grown pigs, which have the run of an orchard where the branches of the trees hang low, and are full of apples. The old sow springs up and catches a limb and shakes it, and then she and the pigs devour the fruit thus shaken down. When all that can be obtained in this way has been eaten, one of the pigs climbs on the mother's back and reaches another limb, which it shakes vigorously, and brings down a fresh supply of apples.

GETTING HIS MONEY'S WORTH.

Ben Wright Got a Ready Call to Repeat Dat Order Quick.

Ben Wright, who died the other day, was the most companionable man I ever met. The oyster house which he opened, at the corner of Brattle and Court street, for years was a Boston institution.

I remember going into Wright's one night a dozen years ago. Seated at the table next to me were four newsboys, accompanied by two girls who sold papers. The waiter refused to serve them.

"What's the trouble my little men?" said Ben Wright, who overheard the conversation.

"Why, this 'ere duffer says he won't give us dat what we wants."

"What do you want, my boy?"

"I want a great big stew, with plenty of oysters and six spoons."

Wright said "all right," quietly gave the order and when it was ready served the boy with a big stew, a large plate of crackers and a platter of pickles. The six spoons were there.

The stew was passed around, the spokesman seeing that each had his or her share, in a few moments it had entirely disappeared. The leader of the party then walked up to the desk and said: "How much stuff, Ben? I tell you dat was cracky."

"Never mind the stuff, my boy; have the stew with me," said Wright kindly.

"Don't want no stuff?"

"No, my boy."

"Well, repeat that order quick."

No one laughed heartier or enjoyed the retort more than honest Ben Wright.—Boston News.

Southern Women.

The women of the South are yet in that transition stage which must come between earnest inquiry and interest and the full acceptance of the new methods and opportunities for women. They are naturally anxious to know of their increased privileges, and to see the open doors, but there is no aggressiveness. On the contrary, the typical Southern women, active and capable, always prefers to feel and to have the world believe that the men of the family are the leaders, fully able to take care of all affairs save those in the home. She may in truth work herself to death, and take all sorts of shifts and turns in private, but this is her creed, inherited from grandmothers' grandmothers of the long ago. She believes as old Uncle Harvey on the plantation puts it, "De head ur de fambly ought ter allus hab some money in his pocket."

The progress of development in the woman's world therefore lies much in social lines—literary clubs, art clubs, afternoon teas, etc. No explosive questions are proposed; the tend of thought follows a mental current with no underflow of reform in any way; questions of art, of literature, of travel are all discussed at the delightful afternoon fortnightlies, held in the different parlors, with astonishing clearness and closeness. One might venture to say that the greatest readers and deepest students are usually found among women away from the centres. They get from reading what their sisters in the whirl gain by absorption.—Harper's Bazar.

MADE IT LIVELY.

Washington's Birthday Celebrated at Detroit, Mich., in Great Style.

Several Presidential Possibilities in the City at the Same Time.

DETROIT, Mich., Feb. 23.—Washington's birthday, the presence of three or four presidential possibilities, Republican and Democratic, aside from its own particular presidential possibility, Gen. R. A. Alger, and the annual banquet of its crack Republican organization, the Michigan club, were almost too much for the southwestern corner of this state, and it is a cause for congratulation for all concerned that it did not break away from the up-country and set up for itself as the particular stamping ground of the next chief magistrate, be he Democrat or Republican.

There were ex-President Cleveland of New York and ex-Gov. Campbell of Ohio on the one side, with Gov. McKinley of Ohio and ex-Gov. Alger of Michigan on the other, all in the city at once, not to mention others of national fame whom it may lie in the mouths of the people to say that they would grace the presidential chair.

The event which brought together the leading Republican politicians from all parts of this state and many from other states was the banquet to-night of the Michigan club. As its name applies it is a state organization. It has headquarters in this city and branch clubs in the other large towns of the state, and the banquet to-night was one of a series which it has given annually on Washington's birthday since 1885. It was stated it was not given for the purpose of forwarding the interests of any presidential candidate particularly; it was denied that there was any attention to boom Gen. Alger, and it was asserted that its sole object was to kindle the enthusiasm of the Republicans of the state for the party nominee,

WHOEVER HE MAY BE.

Covers were laid for 1,200 persons at the tables upon the main floor, while upon a platform at one side of the hall under a brilliant canopy sat the speakers and guests of honor to the number of forty.

While the guests were assembling a delegation of Republican students who had fled from the Democratic atmosphere of Ann Arbor, rose in their places, indulged in the university yell, and ended with three and a tiger for Alger. While these were still ringing the Alger Republican Club guard, an organization of young men, marched into the banquet hall as a guard of honor, conducting Gen. Alger and the speakers and other distinguished guests to the platform with military pomp.

It was nearly 7 o'clock when the banquet began, and it was something more than an hour later when Gen. Alger introduced Congressman Burrows to deliver the address of welcome. In doing so, Gen. Alger referred to the Michiganizing of the state by the Democrats, and declared that in November next Michigan would elect a legislature which would not only restore the legislative districts to their proper share, but would elect a Republican successor to United States Senator Stockbridge.

Mr. Burrows said the task of welcoming the guests of the club usually devolved on the governor of the state, but owing to a slight mistake the chief executive of the state happened to be a Democrat. He would assure his auditors, however, that it should not happen again during the next quarter of a century. Michigan, he said, had always cast its electoral vote for the Republican candidate for president, and proceeded to give the list from 1856 down. When he reached the name of James G. Blaine the assembly broke into a round enthusiastic applause and repeated it. His reference to the indorsement of the McKinley law brought out another round, and reciprocity was the occasion of

ANOTHER HAND CLAPPING.

Gen. Alger then spoke with regret of the absence of J. S. Clarkson, who was detained at Asheville, N. C., with inflammatory rheumatism, and said among the letters of regret receceived was the following from the Hon. James G. Blaine, which he proceeded to read:

> Gen. R. A. Alger, Detroit.—My dear Sir: I regret that I cannot be present at your club meeting on the 22d; official engagements forbid. But I cannot refrain from sending a word of good cheer on the prospects of the Republican party. On all leading measures relating to the industrial and financial interests of the people we are strong and growing stronger. On the contrary, our opponents are weak and growing weaker. They are divided; we are united. It we do not win it is our own fault. We will be justly censurable if with such great measures involved every Republican does not feel that he is appealed to personally and that victory in the election depends on him. Very sincerely yours,
> JAMES G. BLAINE.

The reading of the letter brought forth another round of applause. The set speeches in response to toasts were as follows:

Senator Perkins of Kansas, on "Washington, the Farmer and Politician;" Gov. McKinley of Ohio on "Protection as a National Issue;" Hon. S. T. Greenhalge of Massachusetts, on "The Present Duty of the Republican Party;" Senator Dolph of Oregon, on "Washington the Protectionist;" Hon. J. Sloan Fassett of New York, on "Municipal Reform;" Richard Yates, Jr., of Illinois, on Young Men in Politics."

Hon. J. S. Clarkson of Iowa, Hon. J. S. Spooner of Wisconsin, Senator Washburn of Minnesota and Hon. C. H. Grosvenor of Ohio were to have responded to toasts, but were prevented by unavoidable circumstances from doing so.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 23.—The California Athletic club was well filled to-night, the event being a finish fight between Billy Smith, the well known Australian heavyweight, and Frank Keller of Ypsilanti, Mich., for a $1,500 purse. Appraisers' Award Unsatisfactory.

MARSHALL, Minn., Special, Feb. 23.—Considerable feeling is manifested here over the action of the appraisers of insurance in the loss of our court house by fire some weeks ago. It was insured for $18,000, and competent judges say the full insurance will not make good the loss. The appraisers, however, have decided that a little over $12,000 is the amount that the companies will pay. The insurance was carried by eleven companies. The county commissioners will reject the award and a lawsuit is liable to result. The people here and in the county declare that they will boycott the companies in the future if this award is insisted on.

INTO THE RIVER.

A Laborer Falls From a Bridge and Is Drowned.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Special Telegram, Feb. 23.—Everett A. Cutschall, a laborer who has lived in Sioux Falls several years, to-day fell a distance of fifty feet, striking on the ice and breaking through into the Sioux river. The scene of the accident was at the Milwaukee bridge, near the Cascade mills. Workmen have for a number of days been at work preliminary to putting in a steel bridge in place of the present structure. Timbers were erected and a scaffolding was being built.

Cutschall was on top of this scaffolding or bench. The bench suddenly gave way and the unfortunate man fell a distance of fifty feet, striking on the ice which covered the river beneath. His body disappeared from sight. John W. Buell, who was crossing the bridge at the time the accident occurred, ran to the river bank, plunged in and brought the unconscious man out, who died a few minutes afterward. He leaves a wife and several small children.

CANNIBALISM.

An Infant Murdered and Eaten by a Brother and Sister.

ATLANTA, Ga., Feb. 23.—News of a horrible story of murder and cannibalism near Day's Mill has been received. Lucy President, a degraded and idiotic negro woman, left her home and nine-months-old infant in charge of her two elder children, Mark and Linda, aged eleven and nine years. She went to the place of Mr. J. A. Knight, two miles distant, to do some work for Mrs. Knight.

After her departure it seems that Mark resolved upon putting the infant out of the way. So he told his sister what he proposed doing, at the same time telling her that if she told he would kill her. Procuring an axe he deliberately knocked the child in the head and mangled its body in different places. They afterwards ate some of the flesh. When the mother returned and found what had been done she did not show the least sign of maternal grief.

AN OLD OFFENDER.

The New York Express Robber Freely Admits His Guilt.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 23.—McInery, the express messenger who had such an experience yesterday, was brought to this city, his home, to-day. His worst wound is that through the right thigh. The wound on his forehead is slight. McInery told his family that when he found himself in the power of the robber he rolled out some of the less valuable packages and covered valuable ones with them.

The robber was impatient to get currency and threatened to shoot if it was not surrendered. He said to the messenger: "You can't fool me, I have been in this business before." While the robber was waiting to get the money the train reached Lyons and the game was up.

Mrs. McInery said of her son: "He was always gritty. I knew if he was tackled he would fight it out."

J. H. Prentiss, agent of the American Express company in this city, went to Lyons and interviewed the robber. Mr. Prentiss said to-day: "He is the same man who committed the Utica robbery—Oliver Curtis Perry. He admitted the whole thing and told where he had been since the Utica robbery. He said: 'McInerny was a good man, but indiscreet. He ought to have thrown up his hands. I did not want to kill him, but only wing him.'"

Before Perry was captured he had a mustache, but shaved himself with a razor which he carried. Detective Hynes of New York, a Pinkerton man, saw the prisoner to-day. He claims that Perry has traveled throughout the West and South and has all sorts of crimes laid to his credit.

D., Special Telegram, Feb. 23.—Circuit court for Fall River county has just closed, and Sheriff Gifford started yesterday with six convicted prisoners for the penitentiary at Sioux Falls. Among them is Andy Handy, who was found guilty of shooting Andrew Engstrom, a bridge foreman on the Burlington & Missouri road, last November with a double charge of shot.

Andy, who is a notorious character and desparado, was out hunting and his dog jumped on Engstrom's dog; when the latter tried to rescue him Andy emptied both barrels of his gun into Engstrom's body, leaving him a cripple for life. Andy will serve eight years at hard labor. Walter Parker, colored, was sentenced ten years for slugging Chris Krinkler, a recently discharged soldier, in July last, fracturing his skull, from the effects of which he died. Joseph Fragley got one year for stealing a Burlington & Missouri time check from a fellow workman, forging his name to it and drawing the money, pleading guilty to the indictment.

Martin Cross, Franklin Smith and George Rich got one year each for killing range cattle and disposing of the beef. Fall River county is dealing with "rustlers" in a summary manner, and that business has received its death blow. The prisoners were all chained together and every precaution taken to prevent their escape, as they are resolute and daring characters.

County Officials Must Explain.

ASHLAND, Wis., Special Telegram, Feb. 23.—The charges of boodleism in county affairs will be investigated by a grand jury. A meeting was held Saturday night to impress the necessity of such action upon Judge Parish. To-day the judge filed a written order with the clerk of court summoning a grand jury at the May term.

His Valuable Valise Stolen.

WINNIPEG, Man., Feb. 23.—A Jew named Goldloom went out among the lumber shanties of the Lake of the Woods with $3,000 worth of watches, which he was peddling among the men. While traveling from one camp to another he had his valise with its jewelry stolen. He is now searching among the Indians for the treasure.

Grip Caused Insanity.

REDWOOD FALLS, Minn., Special Telegram, Feb. 23.—F. Morse was taken to the asylum at St. Peter Saturday. He was a prominent farmer and for thirty years a resident of this section. An attack of grip is the cause of his shattered mind.

Railroad Men Threaten to Strike.

SIOUX CITY, Iowa, Special Telegram, Feb. 23.—On account of recent discharges of employes of the Sioux City & Northern and Pacific Short Line roads, which are operated under one management, there is a prospect of a strike on these roads. The Engineers' Brotherhood and Order of Railway Conductors considered the matter at meetings Sunday, and it is understood if the men are not reinstated or good reasons given or their discharge they will order a strike. As the roads are short and depend on their connections, which would be compelled to boycott them, the men say they would win the fight or bankrupt the lines.

Chicago Tribune: The Republicans have tried for nearly ten years to make the Democrats quit drinking (in Iowa.) They have failed hopelessly. Let them adopt the feasible policy of regulating and limiting their drinks, and they will not merely advance the cause of temperance but also regain control of the state, which is a matter of some consequence in the eyes of Republicans all over the United States.

David B. Hill held his New York Democratic convention last Monday and had things all his own way. He has secured the entire New York delegation of 72 votes which will go a long way toward giving him the Democratic nomination for president. As a shrewd unprincipaled politician Mr. Hill has no equal in this country—thank fortune—but we have not been able to discover any other reason why he should be a prominent candidate for the office of president of the United States.

Crookston Times: Another story of a fight in a gambling dive comes to us from East Grand Forks. Yesterday afternoon Sheriff Grundysen received word from "that hole of iniquity" that two gamblers had just had an encounter with revolvers. One of them shot five times at his opponent, and missed him each time, He then used the revolver as a club, and then pounded his mar until insensible. The sheriff did not go over to the place as he thought with eight police the town could take care of its everyday scraps without the county officials interfering.

During the month of October last 54,182 immigrants came into the United States. Germany sent 13,224, Norway and Sweden 4,519, Italy 4,441, and the United Kingdom 12,351. These people had evidently never read Senator Carlisle's predictions as to the woes and miseries that were to follow in the train of the McKinley laws. They hadn't heard that America was going to be ruined by the new tariff, How many of them, do you think, would vote the democratic ticket if they really understood that it was a ballot in favor of establishing here the very identical industrial system from which they had run away.—Ex.

The most repulsive spectacle of the Albany convention is the presence of Senator Hill, with his sleeves rolled up working his machine and directing his tools as to the work of the convention. The national senate has had among its members some men whose trust is neither in God nor in the people, but in the adroit manipulation of partisan machinery in their own interests. But it is doubtful if the senate was ever dishonored by such a bold, brazen, self-confessed machine manipulator as Hill, who is attempting to force his name upon the Chicago convention, and secure the nomination by the use of the combined forces of the base and corrupt and corrupting influences. The fact that such a man secures a seat in the United States senate is a powerful argument in favor of popular elections of United States Senators.—Minneapolis Journal.

Minneapolis Journal: The New York Republican state committee will call the state convention to elect delegates to Minneapolis on Feb. 29. That will be a delegation 72 strong. New York has not generally been successful in impressing its preferences on a Republican national convention as to the head of the ticket. It has, however, on three occasions named the vice president (Wheeler, Arthur and Morton.) The New York delegation has never been able to name the Presidential nominee. In 1880 when the thing was supposed to be nearly accomplished for Grant a split in the delegation occurred and Garfield was nominated. The New Yorkers failed with Depew in 1888, with Conkling in 1876 and with Seward in 1760, Altogether the New York 72 will come to Minneapolis with no prestage for President making.

The state department will be astonished when it gets, in a few, days the formal claim of the sailors on the Baltimore, who were wounded by the Valparaiso mob. Lawyer F. Alleyne Orr has the cases of twenty-four men who were all wounded in Valparaiso streets They are common sailors or coal-heavers, but they want big money for their rough handling by the Chileans, Their combined claims foot up $1,350,000.

The largest sums are demanded by John Hamilton, sailor, and Jeremiah Anderson, coal heaver. They apply for $150,000 apiece. Hamilton has three bad wounds and declares that there is still a piece of a Chilean dagger in the wound that refuses to heal. Anderson is disabled by several wounds the most ferious being in the lung. Other claims vary from $100,000 to $30,000

When Orr was asked why these men, who never had so much in all their lives as one years interest on the indemnity demanded, make such big claims, he said "We don't want to have any of the balance of the indemnity that is to be paid go back to Santiago." Chile may pay $2,000,000.

The people of the United States gave a generous welcome to the reciprocity scheme from the moment that it appeared in congress, and no measure of the present administration has received more hearty public support than this. Influences ephemerally potential in the republican party were arrayed against it, but all this disappeared when expressions in its favor came pouring in during the summer and early fall of 1890 from boards of trade and commerce, from district and state conventions, and indeed from all the places where the people gathered together to discuss and commend the reciprocity plan. Attempts were made in certain quarters to show that the reciprocity plan was opposed to and interfered with the great doctrine of protection to American labor to which the republican party is fully committed: but all this disappeared when it was seen by the people that what was comprehended in the scheme was an increased trade with countries that produce articles which we cannot produce, which articles we can purchase with the products of our farms and mines and manufactories, which our southern sister nations need and which they cannot produce, Reciprocity of this kind is an aid to protection and broadens the field of the American laborer by opening new markets for his products to be paid for in articles which can never compete with his labor.—Grand Forks Herald

HUMOR

BEFORE AND AFTER.

The Way You Feel About Your Wedding Trip Two Months After.

They were in a carriage being whirled toward the depot. The groom fidgeted a little because the rice that some one had dropped down his back made him nervous. The bride was trying to repair the damage done to her back hair by a slipper that had been thrown after them.

Finally the groom got everything satisfactorily adjusted, and, as his arm stole around the bride's waist, he said softly: "Darling, we will have a splendid trip."

"Yes, dearest," she replied, as she stopped her hairdressing and laid her head on his shoulder.

"Think of every one freezing up here while we are in the south—at St. Augustine, for instance."

"It must be lovely there at this season," she said as she softly patted one of his hands. "I've never been south."

"And then as it gets warmer we'll come north along the Atlantic coast, stopping at points of interest until we reach Washington and New York."

"It will be magnificent, Harry," she said as she looked up into his eyes, "but I should think it would be awfully expensive."

"I'm looking after the expense, darling," he said in his superior way. "You mustn't worry your little head about that."

It was two or three months later that they were rolling along in a hack from the depot. He was busy trying to arrange the valises so that they would not interfere with his feet, and she was struggling with some shawl straps.

"Well, Harry," she said, "we had a splendid trip, didn't we?"

"We ought to have," he returned. "I'll bet we depleted the United States treasury surplus. A government mint could not have stood a month more of it."—Chicago Tribune.

Self Evident.

Sharpson—What's the matter, Phlatz?

Phlatz (with his hand on his cheek)—Toothache. Had it all day. Went to the dentist's this morning and he pulled four teeth on one jaw, three on the other and told me to come again next week. Hurt me like sixty. When the toothache gets a firm grip on a man it hates to let go. I remember four years ago I——

Sharpson (looking at his watch)—Phlatz, if you didn't have so much jaw you wouldn't have so much toothache. Good day.—Chicago Tribune.

She Was Proud.

Young Wife—I knew you would like the slippers, Harry, if for no other reason, because I made them.

Husband—You don't mean this is all your work! Why, what a talented little wife I have, to be sure.

Young Wife—Yes, all my work. Of course I bought the uppers and Mary sewed them together and I got a man to sole them, but I put the bows on and did them up in the box. And do you know, Harry, I am just proud of myself. I didn't think I could ever do such things.—Boston Transcript.

Liberal.

Head of Firm—Mr. Penwiper, you have been very faithful to us this year, and we have decided to show our appreciation.

Penwiper—Yes, sir. I have tried to do my duty.

Head of Firm—So we have observed, Penwiper, and in view of this fact we have decided not to reduce your salary on the first.—Clothier and Furnisher.

Effective Realism.

Playwright—Is her acting natural?

Manager (enthusiastically)—Natural? Why, when she appeared as the dying mother last night a life insurance agent who has her insured for $20,000, and who was in the audience, actually fainted.—Brooklyn Life.

Knew What He Was About.

Clerk—You had better get this underwear a size too large, to allow for shrinkage.

Customer—Oh, this is all right. It's for my youngest boy.—Clothier and Furnisher.

He Played Right Out.

He (awkwardly)—Ah, Miss Mabel, I hope you understand my feelings?

She—I'm sure I'm quite in the dark.

He (despairingly)—Then suppose we strike a match!—Philadelphia Press

Nothing in It.

"She makes all of her own dresses. Don't you think she would make a good wife for Alfred?"

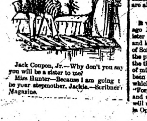
"No, indeed! Think how poor her father must be."—Life.

Ready for an Argument.

Mother (reprovingly to little girl just ready to go for a walk)—Dolly, that hole was not in your glove this morning.

Dolly (promptly)—Where was it, then?—London Truth.

Breaking the News.



Jack Coupon, Jr.—Why don't you say you will be a sister to me?

Miss Hunter—Because I am going to be your stepmother, Jackie.—Scribner's Magazine.

RATS IN A MENAGERIE.

Rodents Lame the Elephants and Gnaw the Hide of the Rhinoceros.

Few of the many people who visit the Central Park menagerie know why a fox terrier is to be found in one or other of the inclosures in which the elephants are confined. The majority doubtless think there is something almost cruel about it. As a fact, it is fun to the terrier and a protection to the elephant. It is really an exemplification of the fable of the lion and the mouse.

There are no greater pests in the menagerie than the rats. These small rascally rodents have found that the feet of the elephants are excellent eating and have no hesitation in gnawing at them when the animal lies down, and, owing to its chained condition, is unable to defend itself against its puny enemies. This is particularly the case with "Tip," who, owing to his vile temper and murderous habits, has to be securely chained.

The rats in a few nights would make this monster a perfect cripple were (it not for "Gip," the terrier, who is always loosened at night, and woe betide the adventurous rat that ventures out on a quest for a tidbit of elephant toe. "Tip," rogue though he is, knows his good little friend and allows him to curl up on the uneaten hay close beside his ponderous body, and when there is a dash across the pen, followed by a mortal squeal, takes no notice of it, except perhaps opening one eye in a lazy way, and then, knowing that he is safe for the night, trumpets a small vote of thanks to his tiny friend and gives himself up to undisturbed slumber and dreams of Indian jungles.

Lately the rats have changed their base of operations. It was found that they were gnawing holes in the thick hide of the rhinoceros. Fanny, the Scotch terrier, who really rules the deer house, and is one of the best ratters in the world, was brought into requisition. She was locked up in the mammal house and her first night there was one of pure joy. Fanny is a most methodical canine. When the house was opened in the morning she had a pile of twenty-seven rats in the middle of the floor and was wagging a short tail in almost a hysterical manner.

After greeting her master, Phil Holmes, she seemed to remember there was something else to do, and taking one of the dead rats in her mouth she ran off to where her litter of pups was, just in rear of the camel shed. She carried four there for the little ones to worry. Fanny has guarded the rhinoceros so well that not a new bite has been seen on the animal, but every morning there is a diminished heap of dead rats on the floor.

There are places in the menagerie where the rat is doing great damage. In the pigeon house there are some rare birds, the Moorhees pigeon from Seringapatam and the American "passenger" pigeon, which seems to have nearly died out with the Buffalo. Both these birds breed plentifully in the menagerie, but as soon as the young ones are hatched the rats carry them away.—New York Tribune.

The Can and the Camera.

"To Milkmen and Others—Beware of the hand camera." If London roguery were systematically organized, some such notice as this might be looked for as a result of the disclosures made by Mr. Hepworth, president of the Holborn Camera club, at his interesting magic lantern demonstration. Among the "London Street Scenes," which formed a large proportion of the slides, was one entitled "Caught in the Act." It projected on the white background a figure of a man standing on a water cart pouring water into a large milk can, while hard by was a cow standing at ease.

The little scene was so full of expression, as the art critics say, that Mr. Hepworth tells us it had been supposed that he had arranged the composition, or, as photographers put it, "posed the subject." This, however, he assured his audience was not the case. He had simply come upon it accidentally when he was in quest of street scenes with a hand camera, with which he secured an instantaneous record of this milkman's method of doing business.—London News.

Only Twice a Passenger.

Mrs. Edward D. Jones, wife of a former well known business man of Pittsburg, who died on Saturday, near Baltimore, was quite a character, though a very retired and refined lady. She had a mortal fear of railroads and of the ocean and never would accompany her husband on any of his pleasure or business trips, only taking two lengthy railroad journeys in her life. One was shortly after her marriage, when she was badly hurt in an accident.

It was ten years before Mr. Jones could persuade her to take another, and her fears were fully vindicated by a general smash up, in which, fortunately, though her head was caught between a seat and the side of a car, she was not hurt. That settled the cars for her. Mr. Jones has been a prominent insurance agent in London for years, but Mrs. Jones has always stoutly refused to visit his present abode. When Mr. Jones wanted a chat with Mrs. Jones, he just took the first boat and a little trip of 3,000 miles.—Pittsburg Times.

Value of Oranges.

The value of oranges as an article of food is well known. "I buy them by the box," says a mother, "and let my children eat them constantly in lieu of candy or other prized children's dainties. I consider that I save money by it." At some of the inebriate asylums oranges have proved an efficient substitute for alcohol, patients sucking the juice of them abundantly every time thirst comes upon them. This fact is so well recognized that often at temperance coffee stands piles of luscious oranges are also kept.—New York Times.

The Courtesy of Assassins.

It will be remembered that some time ago Mr. Constantine Belcheff, the minister of finances, was unskillfully shot and killed while walking in the streets of Sofia in company with M. Stambuloff, the prime minister. It was thought at the time that M. Belcheff was the victim of mistaken identity, and this belief has been confirmed by the following apology which has been carved on his tombstone: "Forgive us; we aimed at Stambuloff and struck you. The second time we will not fail."—General M. M. Trumbull in Open Court.

A BUSHEL OF PETITIONS.

A Little Blunder That Made Trouble for the Sad-Eyed Editor.

The editor could not see that the man was trying to still a tempest in his bosom when he came in but never let on.

"Good morning," he said, with affluent politeness.

"I believe," replied the visitor, stifling his emotion, "that I sent you a communication yesterday beginning with these words (reading from a slip of paper:) 'Colonel Brown received a bushel of petitions from churches and temperance societies asking that the saloons be closed etc:"

"Yes, sir, You did," assented the editor, "and I was glad to print it in—

"But you didn't print it sir," interrupted the irate visitor.

"I beg your pardon, colonel," dissented the editor; "you will find it I think, on the first page. I have not read it, but I saw the heading of the article."

"Well, sir, read it now," and the colonel fiercely thrusted a copy of the paper at him. "Read, sir, read," he went on, wildly quoting: "'Colonel Brown received a bushel of potatoes from churches and temperance societies.' Think of that, sir. A bushel of potatoes! What in the name of justice, truth and equity has a bushel of potatoes got to do with it?" And as the colonel raved and ranted, the editor looked at the cold, cruel type standing out in horrid relief and was utterly speechless.—Detroit Free-Press.

Resemblance Between Husband and Wife.

It is by no means a new theory that a man and woman who have been married a great many years grow to resemble each other, not only in manner and voice, but actually, as to features and expression. Quite recently the photographic association of Geneva has been investigating the truth of this theory by the aid of the camera. The photographs of seventy-eight elderly or very old married couples were taken, and an equal number of family groups. The result proved quite satisfactory to holders of this theory, inasmuch as in twenty-four cases the resemblance between husband and wife was much greater than that between brother and sister, and in thirty cases more it was fully as great. The failure of the other twenty-four old couples to realize the expectations of those interested in the matter is supposably due to "incompatibility of disposition," which time was apparently unable to combat in its effects.

A WREATH OF ROSES.

Idly the maiden's fingers weave
A gleaming crown of roses red,
And singing soft the while, she lays
The fragrant burden on her head.
For their swift death she does not grieve.
Nor sorrow o'er such sweetness fled,
As threading sunny woodland ways
She listens for her lover's tread.
Enwrapped in bliss her soul reposes:
Ah! little she recks of the griefs of roses.

Alas! the fairest hopes deceive!
She cannot dream what power dread,
With hand uplifted, by her stays,
To pluck her in the roses' stead!
E'en while her breast with love doth heave
She droops amid the blossoms dead;
And to our dim, affrighted gaze,
Despair, of helpless terror bred,
An awful unknown fate discloses,
To whom a girl's no more than roses.

ZOE DANA UNDERHILL, in Harper's Bazar.

IT CURED HER.

IT was during the third month of the engagement that Nina came to me and told me that she had decided to go on the stage.

I had known them both from childhood. Jack and I used to play marbles together, and Nina and I used to go coasting together, so I felt quite a brotherly interest in them. I had seen from the start that Jack was in love with Nina, and that Nina was in love with Jack. And, in truth, I had engineered "the deal," as they called their engagement. Jack, being an artist, needed just such a woman as Nina to look after him; a quiet, gentle little woman just the wife for a dreamer.

I once thought that Jack was anything but practical. But my mind has changed, and this is how it all came about.

As I have said, it was during the third month of their engagement that Nina electrified us all by deciding to become an actress, as she said: "I do not intend to go to Jack without a cent in my pockets. He is an artist. Artists, young artists, do not have over much money. There's no reason why I should not help to take care of the family."

Then she told me that she had already been to see the theatrical man, and had been engaged for the star part in the new opera at a fair salary.

And almost before I knew what I was about, I had promised to see all the newspaper men and have the Sunday papers filled with news about her. Then she left me, and in a moment I was in my great coat and on my way to Jack's studio. I found him walking up and down, waving a pink note in his hand, raving like a madman, kicking his easels and his paints all over the floor.

"Just listen to this, will you," he exclaimed, after I had satisfied him that I had nothing to do with Nina's going on the stage, and then he read me the letter she had written to him. It was in effect what she had told me. Their marriage was to be postponed until she had made a success and they could live in comfort. She was sure, she said, that Jack would see it in the same light as she saw it. But it was quite apparent to me that she had reckoned without her host; and it was quite necessary for him to tell me that he didn't "see it in that light, not by a——," but why quote further.

"Well," said I, after he had calmed down a little, "what are we to do about it?"

"Do?" he cried, rising from his chair and drawing himself up in such a dignified manner that despite the situation I almost laughed at him, "I will command her as her future husband to give up this foolish idea; this insane idea. I will show her how in going upon the stage, she will ruin not only her social standing but will also insult me."

"And have you any idea what effect that will have upon her?"

"The desired effect, to be sure."

"It will not. It will make her, if anything, the more determined to do as she has decided. She will quote to you the names of numerous women who are actresses and still retain their good name. She will tell you that she would rather be insulting you than becoming a burden upon you. Besides, she is stage-struck, and that is a disease incurable except by time. How old is Nina? About 18?"

"Yes."

"You were stage-struck at that age, I know I was. Every man is and very few women escape."

"Well!"

"And now the only thing to do is to let her go ahead and take the chances. If she makes a failure of it she will give it up, you may be sure."

"But suppose she makes a hit?"

"Then your life will be ruined."

The blow was cruel. For a moment he hung his head. I thought I saw the lump in his throat. Then he looked up. There was a resolution in his eyes.

"She shall not succeed," he said.

I knew then that he had thought out some scheme.

"Anything that I can do to help you?" I asked.

"Yes; do as she asks you. Have all the papers filled with nice notices about her."

"But that will"—

"Never you mind. Do as I ask of you, please, and leave the rest to me. Encourage her, make her think that she is a great actress—that the world is waiting for her debut. All will end well, I am sure."

* * * * * * *

The next Sunday the papers were filled with Nina, and soon they began to put out the bill-posters with full-length pictures of her. I saw her but seldom, and then she talked of nothing but her ambition, how she was getting along. I saw Jack once. He seemed in excellent humor, and told me that everything was going on just as he wanted it.

Finally the night of the debut came around. The boxes had been sold at auction, and great prices had been realized. All the city was talking about Nina; the papers were devoted entirely to her. Jack sent me some seats and asked me to be on hand early. I had an early dinner and was at the theater half an hour before the time for the curtain to go up.

The house began to fill up early and by the time the overture began there was hardly an empty seat to be seen. I did not see Jack, so determined he was behind the scenes.

The curtains went up. Nina came out and did quite well. Her voice was far better than I had expected, and she did not appear nervous. In fact, I was indeed surprised when, after the first act, there was no applause at all.

I went behind the scenes. Nina met me. She looked uneasy and frightened.

"They are so cold. I am afraid," she said.

Jack, from the other side of the room, winked his eyes at me, and I said nothing.

The curtain went up on the second act. The house remained as quiet as death until after Nina's solos, when there was a buzzing noise and a person in a parquet began to hiss. Nina turned deathly pale, and I thought she would faint. Jack came over to me and slapped me on the shoulder.

"The cure has begun," he said gleefully.

The act went on. The audience had already begun to dwindle and half the seats were empty. Nina looked as white as a ghost and trembled so that I thought she would fall in a faint.

The act ended. The curtain fell. Instantly there went up such a chorus of hisses and cat-calls and groans that I will remember it to my dying day.

The last act was never finished. The curtain was rung up and rung down hardly five minutes later. Nina fainted dead away on the stage, and even then the hissing did not stop.

"She has had enough of it. The cure has done its work," cried Jack to me, as he rushed on to the stage, and, picking her up in his arms, carried her to her dressing-room.

Half an hour later I heard him thanking half a dozen young men, who met him at the stage door, and saw him hand them several bank notes.—Warren R. McVeigh.

SAVED FOUR UNION SOLDIERS.

The Colonel Took Pity on Them, Seeing Them About to Die.

"Did I ever tell you how I once saved the lives of four Union soldiers?" said Colonel William Green Sterett the other day. "Well, you see," he continued, "it was this way. John Miller—of course you know John—showed me a six-shooter which is a sort of heirloom in the family. His brother gave it to John, and their father gave it to John's brother, and a fellow-soldier in Morgan's command gave it to their father.

"One day during the war the original owner of the pistol was riding along the road alone when six Yankee soldiers took after him. He lit out as fast as his horse could go but the Yankees kept gaining on him. His horse was fatigued, he having just gone a long journey, and the Yankees' horses were fresh. After they had gone about a mile, the Yankees gaining all the time, the Morgan man dashed around the bend in the road, jumped off his horse, and took to the hills.

"In a minute or two the Yankees turned the bend and they too dismounted and took after the fleeing Confederate. They came up to him, but in such a place that their numbers were no advantage. The Morgan man leveled that six-shooter, every chamber being loaded, and killed—

"Right here," concluded Col. Sterret, "I looked at John in a plaintive manner. I knew John intended to kill all six of those Yankees with the six shots in the pistol, and I sort a took pity on 'em. I didn't say a word; I just looked at John appealingly." He hesitated, and then said: "He killed several of 'em and then made his escape. That's how I saved the lives of at least four Union soldiers."—Washington Post.

SHE WON HER POINT.

And Her Husband Gave Her Carte Blanche for Expenses.

"Mary," he said, as he scowled at her over the breakfast table.

"John," she replied, fearlessly.

"Mary," he said, "what kind of a breakfast do you call this?"

"I call it an excellent one," she returned bravely.

"You do!" he exclaimed, "Well, I don't! I think a little variety occasionally would be a good thing. Do you realize that this is the third morning this week that we have had corned-beef hash?"

"Certainly, John."

"And that we had corned beef for dinner yesterday and cold corned beef for supper?"

"Of course, John. You wanted me to run the house as economically as I could."

"Yes, but—"

"You said that the amount of meat consumed in this house would bankrupt a bank president."

"I know; but I—"

"And that I ought to plan with more regard for the expense."

"Certainly, certainly, Mary; but hang it all—"

"I've been following your instructions."

"But I don't like corned beef!"

"I know it, John," she said in a business-like way. "That's what makes it last so long. It keeps expenses down splendidly, and, if you want—"

"I don't!" he exclaimed, "I don't! Let them run up! You've got too good a business head for anything outside of a boardinghouse"—Chicago Tribune.

Don't Wear Ear-Muffs.

Ear-muffs are bad things for the ears. Habitual wearing of artificial protection makes the interior of the ear unnaturally warm, and on removing the muff the cold air penetrates the interior of the head and is apt to cause trouble. The man who habitually wears ear-muffs will be certain to take cold in his ears should he happen to forget and go out without them, and ear-ace and abscesses are a common result of these protectors. Persistent use of them is almost certain, sooner or later, to bring on trouble with the ear and possibly with the hearing also—Globe Democrat.

He Was Used to It.

"Pshaw," he said, "there's a great lot of foolish talk about that crank blowing up Russell Sage because he didn't give him a million dollars."

"You wouldn't like that sort of thing pretty much, would you?" inquired the man next to him.

"Like it? Of course not," he replied, "but I wouldn't be raising such a row about it. My wife blows me up every time I refuse to give her a dollar. I'm used to it."

FOR AND ABOUT FARMING.

INSTRUCTIVE MATTERS FOR INDUSTRIOUS FARMERS.

Beginning With Bees—Scab of Potatoes and Roots—Hens or Pullets for Laying?—To Tell Good Seeds from Bad.

Beginning With Bees.

There is wonderful difference between the honey yields of different localities; one man may report: "I never had a greater crop;" while another will say: "My bees have done scarcely anything." There are localities where comb honey cannot be profitably produced, and others where it will not pay to run for extracted honey; in most cases a judicious combination gives best result. Comb-honey is largely sold by its appearance; therefore choose a location where honey plants are such as to produce the finest and best honey. If possible, locate near large alfalfa fields; or where the mountain sides are covered with the different species of sage, or in places where California lilac abounds. An apiary should be located in a valley, so as to give the bees a greater range of flight. The swarming tendency is more or less governed by position of the apiary. If well shaded, and along some river bottom swarming can be controlled very easily. If in a mountain or foothill country, you will have abundance of swarms, and the main difficulty in locations like this is to keep them from swarming too much. To get stocked up with bees better go to some successful beekeeper up with the times, and purchase from him three or four colonies in movable frame hives. It is best not to start with too many, but learn as you go.

The debated question. "Which bees to start with?" is of little moment to a beginner. After you find out your location, then try the different races until you find one that suits you. Some races of bees do well in one location some in another. After getting your bees home and on their permanent stands, read some good book on beekeeping and suscribe for one or more good papers. I think a bee journal of more importance than a bee book, because the journal is constantly presenting the new and valuable discoveries made by the most progressive apiarists of the day. Bee culture could only be learned by study and practice. Learn the principles from the books and papers, then practically apply them; visit some successful apiarist. One visit will sometimes be worth a good many dollars to a beginner. After you are started well study your market; try and build up a good home market. Sell nothing but a good article, thoroughly well ripened, and in a neat, attractive shape. Try and have all your honey first class. Honey should be left in the hives until thoroughly evaporated and all sealed up. Do not extract before it is all capped. Try and use a one-sized frame throughout the apiary; two or more sized frames are a great bother.—Pacific Rural Press.

Scab of Potatoes and Roots.

Extended experience with the scab leads the North Dakota Experiment Station to the following interesting conclusions: Scabby "seed" tubers under ordinary circumstances produce a deceased crop. 2. Seed potatoes free from scab upon soil free from the disease will produce healthy potatoes. 3. The disease germs can remain in the ground from one crop to another. But not the least interesting is the demonstrated fact that by soaking the seed in certain chemicals before planting an undiseased crop can be grown from the scabbiest potatoes, provided the soil be free from the scab germs. The point is to kill the adhering germs and not retard the growth of the tuber, and for this the treatment recommended is with corrosive sublimate—Mercuric bichloride. In the first place the seed to be treated should be thoroughly washed in a vat of running water or in a tub by frequently changing the water. Only the fairest of potatoes should be retained.

For the treatment obtain a barrel and place in it 13 gals. of water. Dissolve 2 ozs. of the sublimate in 2 gals. of warm water, add this to the barrel and stir for a time. Into this solution place the washed potatoes for an hour and a half. The liquid can be used for further potatoes. After the treatment the tubers can be cut and planted in the usual manner. The substance employed is a strong poison and great care needs to be taken in its use. A similar scab is found on beets of various sorts and as it is probably the same, it is unwise to raise potatoes on the same land successively if they are scabby and it follows that beets should not follow scabby potatoes. It is probable that other root crops are infested with the fungous disease, and likewise it is to be expected that other preventatives will be found effective.—Dr. Byron D. Halsted.

Contrast of Cellars.

A cellar built with too little expense is generally a costly adjunct as long as it lasts. The walls are often not thick enough or properly mortared to make them durable and frost-proof. A mere breaking of joints without using mortar in the middle of the wall will not hold it firmly together. A poorly built cellar, while it lasts, incurs a necessity for banking every autumn, when a quantity of manure or straw is placed between the house and an unsightly fence surrounding it. The following spring this must be drawn away and a general scraping given to the ground it occupied. Providing a harbor for rats and mice and the killing of all the grass near the house are among the exterior effects. The contents of the cellar are liable to freeze in very cold weather unless a fire be kept burning, which incurs expense, bother and danger.

The modern cellar wall is built about 2 ft. thick and mortared throughout above a line 4ft. from the bottom. The top is extended to the floor above, against which it is snugly pointed. No banking outside and no stove or frost inside. Windows double-pane, well puttied and fitted remove the necessity of a candle on entering. It is important to give the ground surrounding the house a good grade and provide eavetroughs for the house, also the earth in contact with the wall may become saturated with water, admitting frost more readily than a merely moist soil and increasing the liability to heave the wall inward. A cement floor that may be readily cleaned with mop or broom and that excludes vermin is a welcome improvement. The destruction in a single year of fruits, potatoes and vegetables by rats and meadow-moles would go far toward meeting the expense of a floor to exclude them.—Clark M. Drake.

To Tell Good Seeds From Bad.

The Germantown Telegraph gives a test for the vitality of seeds which we do not remember having seen in print before. Corn is taken as the sample, but the facts are true of all grains. All seeds may be divided into three parts, the germ, the body and the skin. The germ is the part which contains the life principle—the part which sprouts, and is therefore the life of the seed and of the future plant. On the vigor and perfection of the germ or chit depends the value of the seed. The body is the reserve fund of the germ, which supports the embryo sprouts, both top and bottom, or stem and root, until the root is advanced enough to feed upon the soil. During this process the body is generally absorbed entirely to support the plant. The skin of a seed is merely for protection; it protects the interior from undue moister and minor enemies. The germ is of amber color, about the consistency of old cheese, and cuts under a knife exactly like cheese. The body is harder, of various colors, and much less susceptible to attacks of water or insects. These are the characteristics of well-ripened seed, and are invariable. If the seed is caught by frost before becoming ripe, the chit crumbles to a fine powder and becomes dead. So the test of good seed, sure to grow, is the cheesy character of the germ; a very simple thing, easily tested with a sharp knife, and infallible.

Hens or Pullets for Laying?

Whether to retain the old hens or to hatch early pullets is one of the unsettled questions in keeping poultry, says Poultry Yard: The fact is both the old hens and pullets may be preferred, according to circumstances. That the pullets seem to excel the hens at times is true, but the matured hen is better for breeding purposes than the pullet. The hen, after she begins to lay, will often grow fat and remain so on a very small quantity of food. It is difficult to reduce a fat hen except by actual starvation, especially with some breeds, and this is the difficulty, though unknown to some, that induces them to discard her for the pullet, as the pullet from doing double duty of laying and growing, does not fatten so readily. The chicks from eggs produced by hens are nearly always stronger and more vigorous than those produced by pullets, and the hen lays a larger egg than the pullet. The claim that the hen will not lay as many eggs the second and third years as the first is not true. The hen simply fattens more readily as she enters her second year and becomes aged. If fed judiciously, she should cost less than the pullets and lay more eggs, as well as retain her vigor till she is five or six years old.—Western Rural.

Worms at the Root of a Rose.

The small white worms that infest potted plants and eat the roots are the young of a small black fly that breeds in manure or rich soil. The flies may be seen about the roots on the surface of the soil, and are most easily destroyed by pouring strong tobacco water on the earth. There is no need to repot the plants if this remedy is applied. It may be needed more than once, and any flies seen should be caught and killed. The flies, or rather the grubs, are generally brought in the manure. Another remedy is to dip the pot completely under water at a heat of 100 deg. or as hot as the finger can be kept in it for a second. This will drive out or kill all kinds of worms, and especially earth worms, which are often injurious to plants growing in pots. It is advisable when choosing the soil for such plants to sift it and examine it carefully for these pests, and see that it is free from them. The first indication of the presence of these pest is the yellowness of the leaves and their dropping from the stems.

Short Rows.

It is estimated from very reliable sources that this season Virginia had 100,000 acres of land devoted to tobacco culture.

Eggs from a filthy and vile-smelling hen house can not be really fit to eat. The quality of eggs is affected both by the food and surroundings of the hens.

A correspondent says that in saving seed corn there are five points to look at: Length of ear, depth of grain, smallness of cob, well fitted ends, and a good place to keep it.

The Country Gentleman says an Albany county farmer placed on each bale of hay shipped, the information that it was grown on gravelly loam and was free from dust and chaff—with name and address, and for this got $1.50 above the market price.

There are some ways, at least, in which more protection would help the farmer. If he would protect his cattle from cold, storms and winds, his poultry from vermin and his tools and machines from sun and rain, it would increase his income and reduce his expenses.

When cuttings are being rooted by amateurs in small tin or earthen vessels, placed in sunny windows, the process can be forwarded by painting the receptacle black. The color absorbs the heat and imparts it to the sand or earth, thus facilitating the starting of the roots.

Do not allow the sheep to be out long in rain or snow. When the fleece gets filled with either, it takes a long time to dry out and a great deal of animal heat to dry it out, and this heat requires extra feed to keep up. A heavy fleece thoroughly saturated with water is a heavy load for the animal to carry about.

The Time to Spring.

"I wonder why Congressman Springer is making himself so promiscuous and so numerous," observed the Horse Editor.

"It is his prerogative," replied the Snake Editor.

"Because he happens to be a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I suppose."

"No; that isn't it."

"What is it then?"

A Grand Endowment.

To invigorate is to endow with health. This is conferred upon the feeble, the nervous and the dyspeptic by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the great enabling medicine. It recreates, as it were, the ability to digest and to sleep. It agments the appetite, and, since it increases the power of the system to incorporate food as part of its substance, it tends to remedy leanness. Malaria, kidney complaint, la grippe and liver complaint are cured by the Bitters.

The personal injury suit of Bennett vs. the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for $20,000 damages, which has been on trial for several days in the district court at Jamestown was ended. The jury found their verdict for the defendant. The jury in a former trial gave Bennett $2,000 damages. On an appeal the supreme court granted a new trial.

In the celebrated case of The State vs. Anderson Healy, in which the defendant was found guilty of a crime against the election law a few weeks ago, Judge Winchester granted the petition for a new trial. In granting a new trial the judge gives the defendant the advantage of every doubt in the mass of conflicting affidavits regarding the conduct of the jury.

Workmen opening up a new stone quarry two miles south of Alden, unearthed the skeleton of a man. The bones were white with age but in a state of preservation. It was at a lonely place in the timber and old settlers are inclined to think some foul play was committed several years ago on one Johnson, who disappeared very mysteriously.

The family of Matthew Cheney, living in the northern part of Sac county, was suffocated by coal gas. A neighbor who went to the house found all the family insensible, and at once summoned a physician. It was too late to save all the family, and a young man and a child died. All the rest of the family are very feeble.

Fire was discovered in the Purdy block at Independence the other morning, occupied by Till & Road's boot and shoe house, the Commercial State Bank, Jewel's restaurant, W. Francis, money loaner, and other offices. The fire had been smouldering all night and had gained great headway when discovered. The damage by smoke, water and fire is between $6,000 and $8,000.

A FATAL SHOT.

A Drunken Father Plays the William Tell act.

Ben, whose boy 're you?" The voice was thick and husky.

"Your'n, pop."

"An' who's the best shot in these parts, Ben? Tell these fellers."

The man's dull eyes fixed themselves on the boy. The little fellow's face lighted up and he answered, looking around defiantly:

"My pop's the best shot in Montanny."

A silence fell over the crowd and something of pride gleamed from the whisky-dimmed eyes of old Billman. Then he said, handing the boy an apple:

"These fellers 'low I'm no good, Ben, an' I'm jest goin' to do our Willyum Tell act an' show 'em that Jim Billman kin draw as fine a bead now as ever he could."

Billman patted his son's head with a trembling hand and the boy drew himself up proudly as he took the apple from his father.

"Go over to that tree, Ben," commanded Billman, at last, and the boy walked with a fearless step to the place indicated, turned his back to the tree, removed his hat and balanced the apple on his head, then placed his hands behind him. There was not a quiver in his face, not a shadow of fear. His father, whom he loved and who loved him, was the marksman.

Old Billman raised his gun to his shoulder. The weapon shook in his nerveless hands like a reed. Uttering an imprecation, he lowered the gun and brushed his sleeve across his eyes. Then he tried again, but still without success.

"I know what's the matter," he muttered, and took a drink from a bottle in his pocket. "Now, then, all right, Ben?"

"All right, pop."

A short moment the gun trembled in Billmaan's hands and then—

Sping!

It was a strange, dull sound, not like the crash of a bullet through oak, but more like—

Great God! the smoke had cleared away and the boy was lying in a lifeless heap upon the ground—killed by his drunken father! A cry as of a wild beast, a rush, and old Billman had the bloody form in his arms.

"Kill me!" shrieked the old man, rocking to and fro, "kill me!" but the miners passed silently away one by one, and left the wretched man alone with his grief and his dead.

The Metal Tungsten.

The metal tungsten hitherto has had no use in the arts, and has been merely one of the curiosities of mineralogy. But recently it has been discovered to have some very useful properties, one of which is that when added to steel it imparts an extraordinary elacticity to it, and on that account it is now being used in the manufacture of heavy artillery. It is a curious fact that some of the most surprising discoveries now being made are connected with warlike purposes, and not in the arts of peace, unless we may look upon the preparations for war as necessary to secure the peace of the world, and thus properly and usefully advance the practice of the useful arts. This metal is one of the heaviest known, having a specific gravity of 18.60, gold having a gravity of 19.26. It has been a very scarce metal, probably because of the want any practical use for it, but now that it is being searched for it is being discovered where it was not expected. It has been hitherto found mostly in Sweden and in the States of Connecticut and Maine. But recently large deposits of it have been found in New-Zealand. It is found in combination with lime, iron, and lead, and this ore has been called wolfram. As it has not so far been of any use in the arts there is at present no established market price for it. The most common ore is that known as wolfram, which appears as a soft yellowish or greenish earth that is very heavy and contains 79.3 per cent. of tungsten and 20.7 per cent of oxygen.

MRS. NEVINS MAD.

Young Blaine's Mother-in-Law Wrought Up by the Secretary's Statement.

She Declares That Mr. Blaine Did Not Confine Himself to the Truth.

New York, March 1—An evening paper says that Mrs. Nevins, the mother of Mary Nevins Blaine, who recently secured a divorce from James G. Blaine, Jr., was seen to-day in reference to the statement sent out by Mr. Blaine, Sr., in which the secretary of state proceeded to answer the remarks made by the South Dakota judge when he granted a divorce. Mrs. Nevins discredited in vehement terms Mr. Blaine's statements, and then said:

His story of our interview with Mrs. Blaine is largely manufactured out of whole cloth. I will tell you exactly what took place. I accompanied my daughter to the house. The nurse and the child were with us. We were shown into the drawing room. Mrs. Blaine came in. We all bowed and asked to see her husband. Mrs. Blaine said we could not see him. She insisted upon the nurse leaving the room. She would not discuss the matter before a servant. The nurse and little Jim went to the kitchen. We continued to talk matters over for some time. All three of us were perfectly cool. Mrs. Blaine said, when Marie spoke of going away again: "Well, you can leave your baby here if you want to." If Marie had been some poor outcast whom Jim Blaine had seduced, Mrs. Blaine could never have spoken in a more brutal manner.

I spoke up for Marie: "They have both done wrong, Mrs. Blaine, in marrying without our consent." A moment or two later she turned to my daughter and said in an extremely significant way: "Well, your marriage was all wrong anyway, Marie."

Then I protested. Mrs. Blaine instantly flew into a fury. She rang a bell and a servant appeared with surprising speed. If it had been my servant I should certainly have accused her of eavesdropping. "Show these persons out," cried Mrs. Blaine, and then she added: "And watch them."

We walked out and called the nurse and little Jim. At the door of the carriage the nurse, who was crying out of sympathy for Marie, said: "Mrs. Blaine, you are a goose to go away like this; you are his wife. Go right up to his room. No one has a right to stop you." Marie went back into the house. I staid in the carriage. Then it was that the scenes took place.

ANOTHER UNFORTUNATE.

Henry C. Borstell of New York Seeks a Dakota Divorce.

Yankton, S. D. Special Telegram, March 1.—Henry C. Borstell, consul general to Pernambuco, Brazil, under the Cleveland administration, has taken up his residence here, preparatory to applying for a divorce. When Borstel's successor was appointed his wife refused to return to this country with him, and he was obliged to return home alone. He resided in New York after his return in 1890, when he began proceedings or divorce. He says that he was given a decree, for which he paid his attorney $25. It was nearly a year before he discovered that he had been victimized, and that his divorce was bogus. In the meantime his wife returned to her home in Maine, and to avoid property complications he was advised to come to Dakota and procure a legal separation. He will be obliged to live in Yankton six months before he can get his decree.

Carleton College Senate.

Northfield, Minn., Special, March 1.—A senate composed of ten students, each class being represented, who shall have authority almost equal to that of the faculty, is what Carleton college students are proposing to establish. The matter was first brought to public attention at the mass meeting held in Willis hall last Friday night. A large number of the students, as well as the faculty, are favorable to the idea, and it will probably be promulgated within a few days. Its duties will be to hear complaints from students, pass upon offenses, etc., and give judgment entirely free from interference from the faculty, although subject to its approval or condemnation. The students who are fighting the move say that it will amount to nothing but the appointing of a large number of spies, whose duty it will be to keep close watch upon the actions of all students who are supposed to be a little shady at times. A similar plan has been in operation at Dartmouth and other Eastern colleges for years.

A Typical Pioneer Gone.

Eau Claire Wis, Special Telegram, March 1.—Rev. J. C. Sherwin died Sunday. Funeral services will be held at the First Congregational church to-morrow, but the burial will take place at Menomonie. Mrs. Sherwin, widow of the deceased, has been superintendent of schools of this county, and is now principal of the Lincoln school. Mr. Sherwin was for many years better known throughout this section than any other Congregational clergyman in Wisconsin. He has been pastor of churches at La Crosse and Menomonie. He served as superintendent of home missions of Western Wisconsin. He was a typical pioneer and, while a man of unusual literary culture, he was considered years ago the best rifle shot in the Northwest.

Hudson, Wis., Special Telegram, March 1—A. H. Clink came over from St. Paul again to-day to see his daughter, who is alleged to have been married to Fred Smith, alias Barday, and who has been spending a month here at the Central house. The father brought the girl's clothes and assured her that if she was married to the man he must support her. But before leaving for home he told her if Freddie was unsuccessful in the effort she might return home, as her mother was feeling badly about the affair. They are now negotiating with a view to joining the Cactus Oil Doctor's Concert troupe.

BOLD PLOTTERS.

Nihilists Plan to Take the Life of Russia's Ruler.

St. Petersburg, March 1.—There is no doubt that a genuine plot to assassinate the czar was recently discovered. The conspirators planned to murder the czar while he was on his way to the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, situated on an island in the river Neva, upon the occasion of the funeral, on Jan. 29 last, of the Grand Duke Constantine, uncle of the czar.

The conspirators planned to kill the czar while he was on the way to the cathedral, but were arrested before they could carry out their plot. A number of military and several naval officers, two of whom have since committed suicide, are said to have been concerned in the conspiracy. Twenty students, several minor officers of the government, and a number of other people are under arrest, charged with being concerned, directly or indirectly, with the latest attempt to kill the czar.

The news of the discovery of this plot has been carefully kept from the ears of the czarina, whose health is said to be so delicate that any severe shock might prove fatal to her mind, even if it did not cause her death.

IT WILL BE ANSWERED.

Judge Palmer Promises to Reply to Mr. Blaine's Statement.

Sioux Falls, S. D., Special Telegram, March 1—All attempts to secure an interview with Mrs. Blaine upon the subject of Mr. Blaine's statement have failed, as she is determined to say nothing under the impulse of the moment. She is lying at her hotel in this city, very ill, and is not physically capable of making a statement. Judge Palmer, attorney for Mrs. Blaine, said:

I have just read the letter. I have not much to say for publication further than that in the proper season and in a proper way answer will be made. Mrs. Blaine, Jr., is now sick in bed at the Cataract house. I have advised her to make no hasty answer. The letter comes from a high source and was evidently prepared after deliberation, and the answer should not be dashed off in a moment. I can assure you, however, that an answer will be made and that it will be a complete one, too.

Further than this the judge would not say, skillfully parrying all questions as to the probable nature of the reply. Mrs. Blaine was too ill to see the reporter when his card was sent up. It is understood, however, that the answer will create quite as much of a sensation as the letter.

A Liberal Victory Predicted.

London, March 1—Sir William Harcourt made a speech at the Liberal club to-night. He said he had snatched a moment from his duties in the house, happy in the knowledge that the opposition had just beaten the government by a majority of two. The Liberals had had the joy of welcoming to the house their commander-in-chief, who had returned full of life, strength and hope. Never had army a more experienced and trained leader. Never had a leader a more courageous or a more disciplined force. These facts assured them of success in the coming national struggle.

No united effort is being made on the part of our citizens to get affairs in a position that will enable the Great Northern road to gracefully meet our requirements. That the construction of this road into our city will be dropped unless the cost of right of way is reduced about one half, is a foregone conclusion. Spring will soon be upon us and we should be fixing matters so that we will be in readiness for the consequent events,—Red Lake Falls News,

Washington Feb. 25—The Manitoba railroad company has notified the interior department that it will not disturb the settlers who have taken up claims on its lands in the Red River Valley in Minnesota; but it asks of congress to indemnify its losses or give it equal value in script,, It will require the passage of a special bill to allow of this move on the part of congress and a measure will be introduced at once for that purpose. This action on the part of the railroad will be hailed with joy by many settlers in the Valley who were sure of losing their lands.

The annual village election occurs next Thusday and there has been considerable talk about candidates the past week. Rumors have been numerous and many different candidates spoken of. The following names have been suggested for the offices named: For President, Dan Patterson, E. M, Hoff, S, M. Dainard, for councilmen, S. M. Hoff, L. K. Kolstad, Christ Hall, George Fricker, Emil Holmes, Henry Jackson; for recorder, J. L. Johnson; for Justice of the peace J, M, Hanson and O. H. Peters: for constable, Ed Whaley, C, A, Brink and Dan Patterson; for treasurer S. M. Dainard, B. E. Burkee, O. W. Brink and J, C. Dahl. None of these have as yet announced their willingness to serve their country. A caucus will probably be called for saturday night and a ticket nominated.

Crookston Times: E. P. Tuffts, of Fertile, arrived in the city last night, having in custody a man named Carl Swanson, who recently stole a team of horses from L. E, Larson, of East Grand Forks. After appropriating the team for his own use Swanson drove it to Fertile and there made a trade with Tuffts, giving him the horses for one owned by Tuffts. The stolen team was traced to Fertile and recovered by Sheriff Grundysen on Wednesday, but no clue could be obtained of the whereabouts of the thief, Mr. Tuffts wanted his horse back and started in pursuit, and yesterday overtook his man in Norman county, and succeeded in landing him in jail in this city last evening.

George A. Ralph returned from his cruising tour yesterday and speaks in glowing terms of the country contiguous to the Red Lake reservation. He says that there is plenty of land around the reservation that could be taken by settlers with limited means and would pay well with a little care. East of the reservation and the Red Lake the country is settling rapidly while the lands are heavily timbered the energetic husbandman could fell enough timber to keep him in comfortable circumstances from its sale. He could also clear from three to five acres of land a year and raise a sufficient amount of small grains and vegitables to live on so that his wood sales would be clear gain to him, There is plenty of meadow land where excellent hay can be obtained and Mr, Ralph says he is surprised that settlers are no picking up the lands more speedily than appearances indicate. He feels certain that the railroad will be built in that region and then the tide of immigration will immediately commence to settle the lands. The timber lands are of excellent quality and growth, and consist of pine, cedar, oak and spruce.—Crookston Times.

Washington Feb. 24.—Congressman Lind has been looking up the matter of securing an amendment by which the lands of the Red Lake reservation can be given to homesteaders without requiring the payment of $1.25 per acre The bill, which was passed by the Fiftieth congress, opened the agricultural lands for settlement, but in addition to the residence of settlers upon the land they were required to make payment for the same. Mr. Lind called upon Representative Holman this morning to ascertain whether he would object to a proposition of that kind, assuring Holman, by way of argument, that if the timber lands were properly disposed of there would be more than enough money from the proceeds of the sale of lumber to pay the amount allowed to the Indians. Holman said that while there might be some sence in a proposition of that kind he had grave fears that the full value would not be gotten out of the timber, and for that reason he was not disposed to consent to any legislation relieving agricultural lands from payment required by law.

Representative Holman says: "It would be highway robbery to allow settlers to have the Red Lake reservation agricultural lands without paying for them. The sales of timber lands will not be compensation to the Indians because the appraisment of these lands has been made at no more than half their value, No such legislation can pass this congress.

Architect A. E. Permain has completed the plans for the new jail building for Polk county and they will be forwarded to Secretary Hart, of the state board of Charities and Corrections,

The plans are complete in every detail, and call for a structure that will not only defy the inhabitant in the narrow cell of making his escape, but will also be one of the finest and most imposing structures in the state.

The plans call for a building 54 feet wide over all and 84 feet deep. It will be a two story brick, with stone trimmings, and the jail proper will contain sixteen cells—eight on the ground floor and an equal number on the second. The sheriff's office and jail will be fire proof, and the cells and all conveniances pertaining to the same will be of the most approved pattern, The first floor of the building besides containing the sheriff's office and eight cells will also be arranged for living rooms—while the floor over the living rooms will be utilized as bed rooms. All modern conveniances have been provided for in the plans and Architect Permain feels not a little justified pride in the completion of the plans.—Crookston Times.

A Monstrous Monstrosity.

The New York Medical association and all the M. D.'s of the great metropolis are agog over the appearance of a freak of the most startling nature. This monster of monstrosities is a full grown man in the undisputed possession of three tongues, four chins, three cheeks and three ears, one of the latter being as large as that of an elephant. Besides the three separate tongues mentioned, this unexhibited freak has four smaller ones, which seem to be undeveloped from nothing but want of space. They are as perfect in formation as the larger ones, but are so small (less than an inch in length) that they are not claimed by the unfortunate possessor to be tongues at all.

The man can speak plainly and fluently in three different languages. He has four well formed chins, the lower one being fully ten inches from the upper lip. The right side of his face is normal, but the left is divided into two separate cheeks. What the doctors consider the most wonderful of all this wonderful creature's makeup is the gigantic ear on the left side of his head. It hangs down like the ear of an elephant, measuring exactly twenty-one inches from the crown to the lower end of the lobe! This mammoth article is perfect in formation and use, with the exception of its size and the fact that the opening is about ten inches below the side of the head.

This, the greatest of the nineteenth century human wonders, is Juan Jose Antonia. He was born a slave in Jerusalem of Arabian slave parents. When he was twenty-two years of age he was stolen by a band of Arab slave dealers and taken into Egypt. They kept him for some months in Alexandria and then took him to Mexico. From the last named country he escaped and finally landed in New York.—St. Louis Republic.

Fresh Air in Winter.

Why is fresh air, the very breath of our nostrils, treated by nine-tenths of us as an enemy throughout the winter? It is as essential to health and life in one season as in another. And yet from November until May seven-eighths of us do our best to barricade our dwellings against it. It is impossible to prevent such a close besieger from gaining the advantage now and then, but we do what we can to make our castles impregnable to the outer air. We fortify our doors and windows with contrivances of all kinds to exclude it, and when through some oversight it gains admission we exhaust the intruder with overheated stoves and furnaces. If we can not altogether keep it out we can at least poison it when it gets in.

A few hundred of us, congregated in an unventilated room, can soon deprive the air it contains of its vital principle, and were it not that this sleepless enemy outside occasionally makes a plunge into the apartment when a newcomer steps in to assist in the poisoning operation, the coroners would never have a moment they could call their own. As it is, the opponents of fresh air keep them pretty busy.

The occupants of tenement houses, by dint of stopping up crevices with rags and shutting down the dampers of their cracked stoves so as to prevent the egress of the coal gas from their dormitories, provide the malignant typhus with "all the comforts of a home," and contrive to put a large amount of fees into the pockets of the coroners during the inclement months. Self suffocation is quite an "institution" in this community.—New York Ledger.

Victims of Fashion.

A correspondent of the Rockland (Me.) Tribune calls attention to the present scarcity of medricks, those swallowlike birds that once have been counted by thousands along Maine bays and harbors. Their disappearance is due partly to fishermen who collected their eggs for food, and who, to insure fresh eggs, made visits to their breeding places on two successive days; the first was to break all eggs on the island, the second to pick up the fresh eggs. In this way many more eggs were destroyed than carried away. But in spite of this rifling, destructive as it was, the birds thrived fairly well until the ladies took it into their heads, or rather the god Fashion decreed, that their bonnets must be adorned with a tern. Then the destruction began at wholesale.

An enterprising millinery establishment sent a collector to the Maine coast, who established himself on an island and slaughtered thousands. In fact, so many were killed that the price for them, ready mounted for use, was only twenty cents each. How easily they could be killed may be understood when it is known that when one of these birds is killed the others, instead of flying away, keep darting down as if to assist their fallen comrade.

A Young Woman's Singular Experience.

Miss Sadie Myers, daughter of Noah Myers, of Upper Yoder township, recently recovered from a severe attack of typhoid fever. On Saturday, Nov. 28, she fell into a stupor while in bed and lay on her back motionless, with her eyes wide open, looking directly at the ceiling, from Saturday until after dinner on Wednesday, Dec. 2, when she came to sufficiently to tell her relatives that on Saturday, Dec. 5, she would come out of the stupor at 2 o'clock. She then fell into another stupor. Exactly at 2 o'clock she became speechless, but at 2:25 recovered.

She told her relatives that "she was dead and in heaven, heard the angels singing, and was talking to people she knew," and then said that she would get out of bed on Sunday at 10 o'clock and eat dinner at the table with the members of the family, which she did. She further said that she would have two more attacks, but not very soon, and in the second one she would die.—Johnstown Tribune.

There are more coral reefs in the central Pacific ocean than elsewhere, though they abound in the Indian ocean, Persian gulf, Red sea, Madagascar and Mauritius and near the shores of Florida.

SELECTIONS

RATS IN A MENAGERIE.

Rodents Lame the Elephants and Gnaw the Hide of the Rhinoceros.

Few of the many people who visit the Central Park menagerie know why a fox terrier is to be found in one or other of the inclosures in which the elephants are confined. The majority doubtless think there is something almost cruel about it. As a fact, it is fun to the terrier and a protection to the elephant. It is really an exemplification of the fable of the lion and the mouse.

There are no greater pests in the menagerie than the rats. These small rascally rodents have found that the feet of the elephants are excellent eating and have no hesitation in gnawing at them when the animal lies down, and, owing to its chained condition, is unable to defend itself against its puny enemies. This is particularly the case with "Tip," who, owing to his vile temper and murderous habits, has to be securely chained.

The rats in a few nights would make this monster a perfect cripple were it not for "Gip," the terrier, who is always loosened at night, and woe betide the adventurous rat that ventures out on a quest for a tidbit of elephant toe. "Tip," rogue though he is, knows his good little friend and allows him to curl up on the uneaten hay close beside his ponderous body, and when there is a dash across the pen, followed by a mortal squeal, takes no notice of it, except perhaps opening one eye in a lazy way, and then, knowing that he is safe for the night, trumpets a small vote of thanks to his tiny friend and gives himself up to undisturbed slumber and dreams of Indian jungles.

Lately the rats have changed their base of operations. It was found that they were gnawing holes in the thick hide of the rhinoceros. Fanny, the Scotch terrier, who really rules the deer house, and is one of the best ratters in the world, was brought into requisition. She was locked up in the mammal house and her first night there was one of pure joy. Fanny is a most methodical canine. When the house was opened in the morning she had a pile of twenty-seven rats in the middle of the floor and was wagging a short tail in almost a hysterical manner.

After greeting her master, Phil Holmes, she seemed to remember there was something else to do, and taking one of the dead rats in her mouth she ran off to where her litter of pups was, just in rear of the camel shed. She carried four there for the little ones to worry. Fanny has guarded the rhinoceros so well that not a new bite has been seen on the animal, but every morning there is a diminished heap of dead rats on the floor.

There are places in the menagerie where the rat is doing great damage. In the pigeon house there are some rare birds, the Moorhees pigeon from Seringapatam and the American "passenger" pigeon, which seems to have nearly died out with the Buffalo. Both these birds breed plentifully in the menagerie, but as soon as the young ones are hatched the rats carry them away.—New York Tribune.

The Can and the Camera.

"To Milkmen and Others—Beware of the hand camera." If London roguery were systematically organized, some such notice as this might be looked for as a result of the disclosures made by Mr. Hepworth, president of the Holborn Camera club, at his interesting magic lantern demonstration. Among the "London Street Scenes," which formed a large proportion of the slides, was one entitled "Caught in the Act." It projected on the white background a figure of a man standing on a water cart pouring water into a large milk can, while hard by was a cow standing at ease.

The little scene was so full of expression, as the art critics say, that Mr. Hepworth tells us it had been supposed that he had arranged the composition, or, as photographers put it, "posed the subject." This, however, he assured his audience was not the case. He had simply come upon it accidentally when he was in quest of street scenes with a hand camera, with which he secured an instantaneous record of this milkman's method of doing business.—London News.

Only Twice a Passenger.

Mrs. Edward D. Jones, wife of a former well known business man of Pittsburg, who died on Saturday, near Baltimore, was quite a character, though a very retired and refined lady. She had a mortal fear of railroads and of the ocean and never would accompany her husband on any of his pleasure or business trips, only taking two lengthy railroad journeys in her life. One was shortly after her marriage, when she was badly hurt in an accident.

It was ten years before Mr. Jones could persuade her to take another, and her fears were fully vindicated by a general smash up, in which, fortunately, though her head was caught between a seat and the side of a car, she was not hurt. That settled the cars for her. Mr. Jones has been a prominent insurance agent in London for years, but Mrs. Jones has always stoutly refused to visit his present abode. When Mr. Jones wanted a chat with Mrs. Jones, he just took the first boat and a little trip of 3,000 miles.—Pittsburg Times.

Value of Oranges.

The value of oranges as an article of food is well known. "I buy them by the box," says a mother, "and let my children eat them constantly in lieu of candy or other prized children's dainties. I consider that I save money by it." At some of the inebriate asylums oranges have proved an efficient substitute for alcohol, patients sucking the juice of them abundantly every time thirst comes upon them. This fact is so well recognized that often at temperance coffee stands piles of luscious oranges are also kept.—New York Times.

The Courtesy of Assassins.

It will be remembered that some time ago Mr. Constantine Belcheff, the minister of finances, was unskillfully shot and killed while walking in the streets of Sofia in company with M. Stambuloff, the prime minister. It was thought at the time that M. Belcheff was the victim of mistaken identity, and this belief has been confirmed by the following apology which has been carved on his tombstone: "Forgive us; we aimed at Stambuloff and struck you. The second time we will not fail."—General M. M. Trumbull in Open Court.

One-Eyed Celebrities.

Lord Wolseley lost his eye in the Crimean War, and is yet, happily fitted for active duty and all the enjoyments of life; nor can it be doubted that if a big war broke out in which England was a principal, the hero of Tel-el-kebir would have a chance of showing how far he resembled Hannibal, the greatest of great captains, who, like our own immortal Nelson on another element, was one-eyed.

Again, the first Marquise Cornwallis, who capitulated to General George Washington at Yorktown, Virginia, 1783, and was afterwards Viceroy of Ireland and Governor-General of India lost his eye as an Eton boy, having been blinded by Shute Barrington, who died Bishop of Durham.

Within more recent times well-known men abound who, like Colonel Moutagu, Lord Londesborough, and Mr. Egremont Lascelle, have, so to speak, left one of their eyes behind them on the shooting field, which is sometimes scarcely less dangerous than the battle-field.

THE Parker ice gorge reached Pittsburg about daylight the other morning and caused a raise in the river of three feet in an hour, but the ice was badly broken by its long journey and it passed down the Ohio river without doing any damage.

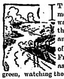
MAID SYBIL'S LOVER.



IT was a sweet summer's afternoon towards the middle of the fifteenth century and the inhabitants of the little village of Friars Holt were all assembled upon the green, watching the attempts of some of the younger men to send their arrows straight to the center of the butts which stood at one end of the chosen place of recreation.

"Another shaft missed the clout," laughed an old man, as the arrow stuck quivering in the turf, falling three yards short of the butt. "The King will never complain that lads of Wainwood make havoc among his deer if he hears of such shooting as this."

"Hold your prate, Gafer Jenkyn," said the young man who had discharged the last shot, pettishly unstringing his bow; "it was a cross wind which marred my shooting unless, indeed, it was the wizard's ward," he added, crossing himself devoutly as he cast a glance of scorn and abhorrence at a young maiden standing some little distance apart from the group of rustics—a fair-haired girl of middle-height, with a pair of laughing grey eyes.

Her age could scarcely have exceeded 18 years and the merry expression of her face as she smiled at the woebegone look of the discomfited bowman had no more wizard's glamour about it than is always to be found in the rippling laughter of a pretty girl.

"Yes, there she be, sure enough," muttered Gaffer Jenkyn, with a glance of malevolent hatred at the young girl. "What business has she down here among us? Even if she can't cast spells herself she can tell all about us to that old warlock who lives in the ruined tower in Carnstone Chase."

By this time general attention was drawn to the beautiful intruder and threats and execrations were leveled at her head.

At first the girl appeared unconscious of her danger, but all at once a stone thrown by a lad grazed her arm, and as she perceived the threatening attitude of the crowd a look of intense terror passed across her face and she turned to fly.

"Do not let the witch escape," cried an old crone. "I lost two sweet grandchildren last autumn. They said it was the falling sickness, but I know better. It was through the devilments of the old wizard and his ward."

A menacing circle soon formed around the poor girl, whose entreaties for mercy were received with shouts of derision, and she would have been seriously maltreated had not a figure burst through the ranks of her assailants and loudly asked the meaning of their cowardly conduct.

The man who interposed in the girl's behalf was attired in the picturesque dress of a forester, though he wore no badge of cognizance of any noble house, and the cloth of which his Lincoln-green doublet was composed was of a finer character than that in which servitors were attired.

"Hullo, my masters," cried he, stepping between the maiden and her assailants, "what wit is this? By the bones of Jonathan, the Archer, call ye yourselves Englishmen to behave in such a manner?"

A confused chorus of explanation rose from the little crowd, but the smith, who had first suggested violent measures, strode to the front.

"This is no business of thine, Hob of the Butts," growled he; "get ye to your own business of stealing the King's deer and leave honest men to look after their own affairs.

"We will have no witches or warlocks amongst us, and this witch, who lives up at Carnstone Chase with old Michael Rexthrope, shall not come down here casting her spell over us and ours."

As he spoke he laid a rough, sinewy hand upon the shoulder of the shrinking girl, but in a moment staggered under the effects of a heavy blow dealt him by the man called Hob of the Butts, who placing the girl's arm in his, drew her through the crowd, not one of which ventured to manifest any opposition.

[illegible] a word until they had [illegible] said, [illegible] cret of eternal youth and the waters of oblivion," replied Sybil Tressider.

Hob of the Butts looked puzzled. "I know not what you mean by the last," said he.

"It is the draught which brings forgetfulness," answered the maiden.

"Then Matt Clink often finds that when he quaffs the nutbrown ale," returned the forester with his merry laugh.

"I cannot ask thee in," replied Sybil, "but from the bottom of my heart I thank thee. I have not met a friend since I can recollect.

She turned from him with a sigh and made her way slowly toward the time-worn tower, which stood like some giant sentinel watching over the bleak waste.

• • • • • • •

In a very few days Hob of the Butts again found himself in the vicinity of the tower and with a willingness which those who were acquainted with his frank and open nature would never have given him credit for, he carried on his shoulders a fat doe, which he humbly offered to Michael Rexthorpe as a tribute from one who, though ignorant, was a devoted admirer of learning.

The cunning old man fathomed the handsome forester's motive in a moment, but he was not one to cast away gifts, even though he felt in his heart that Hob of the Butts had a magnet in Sybil Tressider. He received him graciously and accepted the present.

Sybil and the forester had now many opportunities of meeting and a strong feeling of affection sprung up between them—not unnoticed by the keen eyes of Michael.

There were times when he felt inclined to rend his snow-white beard with disappointment.

And now began a new life for Hob of the Butts; his former sylvan haunts and gay companions knew him not, for he became Michael Rexthorpe's drudge, a mere hewer of wood and drawer of water, and yet he felt that this unaccustomed toil was amply repaid by the opportunity of breathing his love in Sybil's ear and hearing her shy answer in response.

One day Michael's countenance was full of triumph. "I have found them!" cried he, "I have found them. I am not quite certain of eternal youth, for that will be a gradual process; but of the waters of oblivion I have no doubt. I have, however, hit upon a sure means of testing the latter, and will do so on that jolterheaded archer and see if it will make him forget Sybil."

He hastened away to the sleeping-room of the tower with the silver goblets, each containing a small quantity of some liquid, pure and colorless as crystal.

"I will quaff youth," said he, "while the archer shall drain the cup of oblivion to the dregs."

Meanwhile the lovers were engaged in earnest conversation beneath a pink may tree which grew on the south side of the tower.

"Have you not made up your mind yet dearest Sybil?" murmured the archer, in impassioned tones, "will you not exchange this dull tower and the harsh words of your guardian for the sweet retreats of merry green woods?

"The prior of St. Williston's chapel is ready to join our hands, and my trusty camrades will give you a hearty welcome. Fly with me, then and do not waste your young life here."

For a while the maiden hesitated, and then with a deep blush consented to follow her lover.

They returned, and as they entered the keeping-room she saw her guardian carefully placing two silver goblets upon the table.

"Where hast thou been, gadabout?" said he, with an angry frown, "and where is that calf of a bowman? Send him hither and I will hasten him up by partaking of a cup of strong waters with him before he goes forth on his quest."

Michael placed the goblets at separate ends of the table and then shambled out of the room. As he did so the girl caught a malicious twinkle in his eye, which raised her suspicions, and with lightning-like rapidity she reversed the cups; then, hastening to her lover she whispered a few words in his ear.

He nodded, and in a few seconds entered the room where the seeker after the mysteries of the occult was in waiting.

"You want some venison, I hear, Master Rexthorpe," said the forester. "I can lay my hands upon a fair white doe in half an hour."

"'Tis well," answered Rexthorpe, rubbing his hands, "but before thou goest drain this, 'twill hearten thee up."

The forester tossed off the contents of the goblet and was about to leave the room when the old man said: "Whither goest thou, Hob?"

"To the broken cross," answered the forester.

"Good; he hath forgotten all about the doe," said Michael gleefully. "The potion works already; now for my change."

He drained off the contents of the chalice and fell stricken to death, while the forester and the maiden journeyed on to where light and happiness awaited them; for love has been ever the spring of eternal youth, while it is only death's hand that can [illegible] brew the liquor which fills the [illegible] —Sir Gilbert Campbell, [illegible] Globe.

AN INGENIOUS CIPHER.

How the Friends of a French Thief Got Themselves Into Jail.

Several years ago the friends of a a Parisian thief adopted a decidedly unique method of carrying on a clandestine correspondence with him while he was awaiting his trial, says an exchange. One day the jailer was visited by the prisoner's betrothed, who asked him to give her lover an envelope. This upon being opened was found to contian simply a small lock of hair, around which was folded a leaf of a book. The jailer did not consider it worth his while to deliver this souvenir to the culprit, and therefore threw it aside.

A day or two later a similar inclosure was handed in at the prison gate and shared the fate of the predecessor. In the course of a week another was left by the same person. This aroused the suspicions of the Governor of the prison, to whom had been detailed the circumstances. He determined to investigate the meaning, and accordingly first examined the printed leaf. This he found was torn from novel, and contained 26 lines on each side. He then turned his attention to the hair, and discovered that there were 26 pieces of unequal length,

This puzzled him for awhile, and then, suddenly jumping to the conclusion that there must be some connection between the numbers of the printed lines and the number of hairs, he laid each of the latter along the line of the page they respectively reached, beginning with the shortest hair at the top of the leaf.

After changing them about several times he discovered that each hair pointed to a different letter, and the combination thus produced formed a slang sentence, by means of which the prisoner was given to understand that his friends had ascertained the day on which he was to be taken to court and were determined to make a bold attempt to rescue him as soon as he made his appearance.

Taking the cue, the Governor adopted every precaution to frustrate the well laid plans of the outsiders; the attempt was made, and as a natural consequence the conspirators soon found themselves in the some condition as the one for whom they had planned the rescue—Chicago News.

SHAVED WITH STONES.

Clam Shells, too, Were Used by the Ancients to Remove Their Beards.

"Does it ever occur to you to wonder when you complain of the torture of shaving how men managed to keep their faces clean before the exquisitely tempered steel razors of to-day were invented?" said a scientist to a Washington Star reporter.

"You have only to observe the ancient sculptures to see that shaving was practiced in the earliest times. The faces of the old Egyptians are represented in their statues and bas-reliefs as clean shaved except for the beard on the chin. What sort of razors did they use? Nobody knows, but something is known about the evolution of the razor in a general way.

"The first razor was a pair of clam or mussel shells, with which our savage ancestors pulled out the hairs on their heads by grasping them as with pincers. In the course of time it was found out that by sharpening the edges of the shells they could be ground against one another so as to saw off the hairs. Two keen-edged flakes of stone could be employed for the same purpose as Mexican Indians utilize bits of obsidian.

"As a rule, the straight-haired and scant-bearded races to-day, like the North American Indians, pluck out their beards. The Polynesians get rid of their superfluous hair with chloride of lime, which they manufacture by burning coal.

"When the bronze age arrived razors were made of that material, which has since been superseded by tempered steel. The latest razors are fire and electricity. Barbers of the most advanced school nowdays singe the hair instead of cutting it, and an electric needle is used to destroy hairs where they ought not to grow by being thrust into the follices, a slight current killing the roots."

WOMEN AND CABS.

They Will Miss a Train or Catch Their Death of Cold Rather Than Call One.

Of all the ways in which women are "pound foolish" there is none to equal their way of not taking cabs when they know they should. It is charged against them that they will lose a train, catch their "death o' cold," or be late at a funeral rather than hail a cabby, as men universally do. One special woman got a lesson on the subject the day before Christmas, when the mud was of a peculiarly clinging sort. There were about a hundred tiresome little errands she must do before about noon. She had vainly tried to elude all her family on leaving home, but to her had been—"Oh, you'll be near the bazaar, do get the candies for the tree, and the German mottoes," and "oh, please post this in the postoffice [illegible] not there today." The

HIDING PLACES FOR MONEY.

Odd Places in Which Eccentric Persons and Criminals Secrete Their Treasures.

"It is hard to tell where eccentric people will not hide money," said a detective the other day to a London Tit-Bits man. "I was once sent for to find the money of a man who had suddenly died and left no visible trace of his wealth. The family had made a careful, systematic search before I arrived. I learned that he was not miserly, and inferred that he had not used any of those complicated methods of concealment which are one of the miser's chief characteristics. I found that his business took him frequently from home, and that he had formerly been a sailor. I asked what room he usually slept in and they said: 'All over the house,' adding that they had fully examined every place in which he was ever known to be. I asked about his clothing and insisted upon seeing it. Some one brought his garments in at last, and very shabby looking they were. I went over them without success until my eye caught the binding. 'He always kept them well bound,' said his wife. 'Sailors are gook sewers.' The binding was wide, but we soon had it off, and there we found, folded lengthwise, and protected with oil-silk, fourteen £100 notes and a score of "fivers." A systematic search is often not as good as a shrewd guess by an inexperienced person. Yes, there are men who conceal wealth away from home. Criminals almost always do it. Middle-aged countrymen do it, but when they get old they are almost sure to hide it near the spot where they pass most of their time. I have found money in the covers of an old family bible, behind mirrors, in the bored out legs of chairs, behind cupboards nailed tightly to the wall, in false ceilings, balusters, pincushions, in the lining of old hats, in clocks, stoves, and bronze images, in vases with the bottoms covered inside with plaster of paris, in black bottles weighted with mercury and marked 'poison,' in canes, shoes, and in vest-linings, in potted salmon tins and tin canisters, in cracked walls covered with wall-paper, in all sorts of bedding and upholstery, and in almost every conceivable place."

VINDICTIVE WILLS.

Testators Who Have Left Harmless but Spiteful Comments.

At one time it was a common thing for a testator to leave a sting behind him, even if he could bequeath nothing else. Some striking bequests of this description were made by a son of Lady Mary Wortley Montague in a witty will, the blank spaces of which can be filled up by anybody at all acquainted with the eminent men of the period. "To Sir Francis—I give one word of mine, because," so runs the document, "he has never had the good fortune to keep his own. To sir Robert—I leave my political opinions, never doubting he can well turn them into cash who has always found such an excellent market in which to change his own. My cast-off habit of swearing oaths I give to Sir Leopold D—— in consideration that no oaths have ever been able to find him yet." This posthumous political animosity is not so reprehensible, however, as the personal hatred which must have prompted a testator to leave a man and his wife a small sum of money to buy for each a halter, for fear the Sheriff's should not be provided. Such bequests as these are too clear. It would have been better, perhaps, if the testators had sought a little of the obscurity of language which was the aim of a celebrated lawyer who is said to have intentionally drawn his will in ambiguous term in order that it might, by giving rise to litigation, lead to an authoritative settlement of some very fine moot points which had often vexed him during his life-time.—From the Irish Times.

THE MEANEST MAN.

He Read the Paper and Crept Out of Paying for It.

A well-known gentleman in this city moved into a house that had been previously occupied by another gentleman who was a subscriber to one of the evening papers, says the Chattanooga Times. The carrier of course continued leaving the paper for a space of a year, never having been notified of the change. The collector recently went around to collect for the paper, the bill being made out in the name of the gentleman who had subscribed. When the collector presented the bill the gentleman of the house said:

"Why, my dear sir, that man has not lived here for over a year. You are at the wrong house."

"Well has not the carrier been leaving you a copy of the paper all the time?"

"Yes, sir. But I did not subscribe, and I told the boy to quit leaving it. But he never did so."

"You have received the paper every day, haven't you?"

Women's Waists.

While 19 or 20-inch waists may be a deformity in an adult woman, it may be justly doubted whether the 26-inch waist of Venus de Medici is not somewhat too large to be in proportion with the figure of the average American woman. It is characteristic of women of the highest type of the Indo-European races to have wide hips and narrow waists. In other races the hips are narrower and the waist larger. The American woman appears, in consequence of her large hip measurement, to have a smaller waist then she actually has. To the unskilled masculine eye, says the Pittsburg Commercial Gazette, a girl with a waist of 22 or 22½ inches may seem to have a wasp-like figure, when in reality her measurement is very nearly what it should be to satisfy the critical judgment of an artist or her family physician. The Venus de Medici is 5 feet 5 inches in height, 26 inches about the waist, 34 about the bust and 44 about the hips. The women employed as "cloak models" by most of the great dry-goods establishments in New York City are about of the same height. The measurements required of a "model" 5 feet 5 inches in height in one establishment are the following: "Waist, 23½ to 24 inches; bust, 34 to 35; hips, 45 to 47; base of skull to waist, 16; biceps, 11½ to 12." A prominent physician recently gave me the following as the correct measurement for a well-formed, well developed and healthy woman of 5 feet 5 inches: "Waist, 24 inches; bust, 33½ to 34½; biceps, 12 to 13; wrist, 5½ to 5¾; hip 44 to 45; calf, 13 to 14, and ankle, 7 to 7½." The doctor's "model woman" has smaller hips and a smaller bust and about the same waist as a "cloak model."

Particular.

When Miss Frere was travelling in Australia, some years ago, she was greatly impressed with the excellent manner in which Sunday was kept. One aspect of the case, however, she found a little comical.

On the first Sunday of our stay in Brisbane I was summoned to a mysterious interview with our landlady. She had sent to me, she said, because she wished to know whether we should object to having the tea-things on the table at dinner.

"The cooks, they won't cook dinner on Sunday," she explained, "unless you call it tea; and I'm sure you've no idea what a trouble servants are in this country. We can't make 'em do anything; and my husband he's a college man, and I'm sure I've always been a lady!"

So we called our meal tea; but barring the kettle, and the teapot, it was a very good dinner.

The Shape of it.

"Dennis," cried Pat, "will yez pay me the two guineas ye owe me?"

"Faith, Dennis," replied the quick-witted Pat, "ye'd better make it as near the shape of two guineas as ye can."—Harper's Young People.

DRESSMAKERS IN TROUBLE.

The New York Seizure Reveals Costly Female Apparel.

NEW YORK, March 8.—Col. Storey, chief of Surveyor Lyons' staff of customs inspectors, made an important seizure of goods in the trunks of seven cabin passengers on the French steamship La Bourgogne, which arrived here yesterday from Havre. Three of the trunks belong to dressmakers in this city and four in Chicago. Their contents are estimated to be worth thousands of dollars.

One of the trunks stored with lace, silk dresses, tea gowns and other articles of woman's attire belonged to a Mrs. Allibone. She said she was a stranger in this country, did not know the customs laws and merely came to this country on a visit, not knowing exactly what parts of it she should visit. She was dumbfounded when the inspector told her that she could not be quite such a stranger here, as she kept a fashionable dressmaking establishment in Chicago. Two of the other trunks are said to belong to a woman connected with Kate Reilly, the dressmaker whose name came before the public in connection with a recent horsewhipping in Chicago.

The examination of the seized articles in the seven trunks was completed to-day. They are said to worth $5000. In the trunks were numerous costumes and rich female apparel, one of the trunks belonging to Miss J. Mooney, containing a quantity of religious articles.

MR. BLAINE'S CONDITION.

The Secretary Better, but Must Remain in Doors a Few Days.

WASHINGTON, March 8.—Dr. Frank Hyatt, the physician attending Secretary Blaine, said this evening that there was nothing in Mr. Blaine's condition to cause any alarm. He is suffering from a slight inflammation of the bronchial tubes, following a cold contracted last Wednesday. He took an unusually long walk in the country that day, when the weather was somewhat inclement, and overtaxed his strength. As a result he was compelled to take to his bed. The trouble affected his muscles at first and then attacked his bronchial tubes. Mr. Blaine's temperature was high Thursday and Friday, but Saturday it was almost normal and he transacted some official business. That this was an imprudent act was shown the next day, when his temperature again reached a high point.

The case yielded readily to treatment, however, and to-day the fever was much reduced and the patient was feeling better in every respect. He will probably be confined to the house for several days, and in the meantime will not be allowed to attend to any kind of business. He may be able to attend the cabinet meeting Friday.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

An Excellent System Considered by the Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, Special, March 8.—The ten-block system of locating and numbering country houses, so successfully introduced in Contra Costa county, Cal., has recently engaged the attention of the postmaster general, who wants to see if it is not of importance in connection with the extension of the free delivery into the country. The Contra Costa plan removes the only obstacle to rapid and accurate service in the country. It is a ten-block system with the same usefulness and even greater accuracy than that of the city system, because it gives not only the location, but the exact distance of every house from a given point. Starting from a convenient center, say the county seat, each mile is divided into ten equal parts, or blocks, having a frontage of thirty-two rods. Two numbers are assigned to each block, the odd ones on the left and the even ones on the right. Wherever country houses are near enough to be situated within the same block they have the same number, but are distinguished as follows: 525, 525 a, 525 b, etc. Distances can be quickly calculated from the county seat or from one house to another by the simple method of dividing the difference by two (there being two numbers in each block) and the result by ten for the answer in miles.

Significant and appropriate names are given to roads and all by-roads are further indicated by the three words, Local, Connex and Exit, which have definite and uniform meanings; the first, having no outlet, usually terminating in the hills and for local convenience only; the second applied to short, connecting roads; and the third, having no outlet by land, usually ending at a landing with a water exit.

LETTER CARRIERS.

A Decision Touching Their Rights From the Court of Claims.

WASHINGTON, March 8.—The court of claims to-day rendered a decision in the letter carrier cases. In the Salt Lake City cases it appeared that the carriers were employed six hours a day in getting their letters ready for delivery and delivering them, four hours a day during the intervals in distributing letters within the postoffice, and one hour a day or more in postoffice work after their last carrier service had been concluded. They sued under the eight-hour law for additional pay for the additional time. The court decided that the postmaster at Salt Lake City had a right to employ them in distributing mail matter between their trips.

As to the employment after their day's work as carriers was completed the court expressed grave doubt, but the equities of the case being strongly in favor of the carriers, it was deemed right to resolve the doubts in their favor, leaving it to the supreme court to correct the error, if it is an error.

With this company Red Wing will have three immense stoneware plants larger than any other in the West.

Death Without Apparent Cause.

HUDSON, Wis., Special Telegram, March 8.—The remains of John Olson were brought here to-day from a North Wisconsin lumber camp. He retired in apparent health Saturday night and was found in the morning dead. His body seemed so lifelike when his relatives saw it that they called physicians to ascertain whether life was extinct and to learn whether there had been foul play. He was a young man and leaves a family.

At America's Expense.

OTTAWA, Ont., March 8.—A new pamphlet dealing with the resources of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories has just been prepared by the officials of the immigration branch and is now going through the press. It makes a specialty of the testimony of the delegates from the Dakotas who visited the Northwest, and embodies the experience of many settlers who removed from the Dakotas into Canadian territory. The migratory movement which took place last year is expected to be largely accelerated and encouraged by the facts contained in this pamphlet.

LEFT TO STARVE.

A Woman From St. Paul Tells a Sad Story in Chicago.

CHICAGO, Special Telegram, March 8.—Mrs. Charles Anders of St. Paul is in the city looking for her husband, whom she claims deserted her and left her to starve with her little baby boy. She applied for relief to-day at the Desplaines street station and asked the police to assist her in finding her husband.

"We live at No. 969 Sherborne avenue in St. Paul," said she, "and were getting along nicely until one day he left, saying he was going to buy some tobacco. He did not return, and the following day a man came to the house to take possession. He said he had purchased it from my husband for a neat sum, and wanted me to get out. I had no alternative, as he showed me the bill of sale disposing of our house and furniture."

Anders has a sister, Mrs. Frank Smith, who keeps a notion store at No. 258 West Forty-third street. The deserted woman visited her sister-in-law to see if her husband had called on her, and found that he had been there two days ago, but only remained a short time, and said he was going to New York with his wife. Mrs. Anders has seen nothing of him, but has traced him to several places, where he always managed to elude her. She is now destitute, and has been referred to the county agent for aid.

FOUND IN A CESSPOOL.

The Murder of an English Governess Comes to Light After Many Months.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 8.—The British living in this city are greatly excited over the case of the English governess who was so foully murdered here some months ago, and whose body has just been discovered.

The young woman came from England to be governess in the family of Mossolovsky, one of the most respected houses in the Russian capital. She was beautiful and above suspicion in conduct, and it is not known that she had any male admirers. As governess she was sometimes presented to the visitors at the Mossolovsky mansion, and these included officers of the army. The young woman attended the Anglo-American church. Last summer she suddenly disappeared. She had gone to church on Sunday, prayer book in hand, and never returned. Her absence remained a mystery, and when the prayer book was found near the cavalry barracks the suspicion deepened that she had met with foul play.

It is now stated that the body of the young woman, or what remains of it, has been found in the cesspool of the barracks near which the prayer book was discovered. Suspicion attaches to officers and soldiers connected with the cavalry, but no definite evidence can be found to fix guilt upon them.

The British embassy has requested the authorities to make a thorough investigation, and it is said that one or more soldiers are under arrest with the object of ascertaining by the usual Russian methods what they know about the tragedy.

ESQUIMALT DEFENSES.

A Motion to Complete the Works Defeated in Parliament.

LONDON, March 8.—In the house of commons to-day Sir Stafford Northcote called the attention of the state of the defense at Esquimalt on Vancouver island. He spoke particularly of the steps that had been taken to secure the completion of the works required for the protection of the harbor. The Canadian Pacific railway now offered an alternative route to the East, and would be of immense service to the empire in the event of war. Therefore it was important to complete the defenses as soon as possible.

Rt. Hon. Edward Stanhope, secretary of state for war, agreed with the statement made by Sir Stafford Northcote, that the importance of Esquimalt had enormously increased during the past few years. The place, he declared, should be defended, and he greatly regretted that the defense had not yet been completed. The government was anxious that Esquimalt should be fortified, and it was willing to spend its money to bring about that result. Sir Stafford Northcote had prefaced his remarks on the defenses of Esquimalt with a motion that steps at once be taken to complete the works. The motion was defeated without a division.

A mistake made by a telegraph agency which published that Rt. Hon. Edward Stanhope, secretary of state for war, in the debate had declared that urgency had arisen for the fortification of that place "during the last few days" instead of "during the last few years," created a momentary scare, as it was connected with adverse rumors regarding the Bering sea question. The stock exchange was closed or there would have been a panic. The rapidity with which the correction was sent out saved widespread alarm.

To Shut Off Lobbyists.

WASHINGTON, Special, March 8.—A bill has been introduced in congress by Mr. Oates of Alabama to prevent any cadet who may hereafter be appointed to either the military academy at West Point or the naval academy at Annapolis from trying to secure influence for promotion. It is to take, in addition to the oath prescribed, one in which the cadet will be forced to swear that "he never will, directly or indirectly, seek, influence or attempt to influence the president or any member of congress to aid or assist in his promotion in the service which he may be in, or his retirement from it, or to increase his compensation, salary, pension or allowance in any respect." This is designed to prevent the ever-present lobby of army and navy officers who are found about congress seeking congressional influence to aid in their promotion or to secure an increase in their pay.

The Pensioners.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, March 8.—Pensions granted to-day:

Political Convention.

GRAND FORKS, N. D., Special Telegram, March 8.—A Republican city convention has been called for March 22. Mayor Richardson is a candidate for re-election. Several others are talked of, but none have yet developed any organized movement against him. The state Prohibition mass convention meets at the court house to-morrow to select six delegates to the national convention.

Washington Waifs.

WASHINGTON, March 8.—In the supreme court to-day Attorney general Miller presented for record the memorial adopted by the bar on Feb. 6 upon the death of the late Justice Bradley. In doing so he paid an eloquent tribute to the dead jurist.

The pure food bill was debated in the senate, Messrs. Berry and Palmer strongly opposing it.

Secretary Noble, accompanied by Mrs. Noble, has gone to St. Augustine, Fla. The secretary expects to return next Monday.

N. Zink has been appointed postmaster at Spearfish, Lawrence county, S. D.

N. Y. Press: The workingmen of Dantzic are following the example of those of Berlin in rioting for work and bread. Discontent among the German people is not to be silenced by the seizure of newspapers and the sabers of the police. In many cities misery has reached the point of desperation and the arm of industry is turned to deeds of violence. The Kaiser is confronted by a danger more menacing than the hordes of the Czar or the disciplined armies of France. It is the danger of a people who feel that their situation could not be worse and that the sword of authority is powerless to pierce the shield of despair.

Now is the time for the Kaiser to prove himself a statesman in the true sense as the father and friend of his people. Now is his time to show that he comprehends and can deal with the mighty problems of his age and generation All Europe has its eyes on the young man who is heir to boundless opportunities, and who has yet to prove whether he is a Cæsar or Thersites,

Grand Forks Herald: Jake Rhinehart of East Grand Forks who is conducting the examination and estimates of lands in the White Earth and Red Lake Indian reservation, which are to be thrown open to settlement is home for a few days. There is now a force of six men at work which will be increased to nine when spring opens. They have completed appraisements for four townships in the White Earth reservation and are now at work on townships 149, 150 and 151, ranges 39, 40 and 41 in the Red Lake reservation where they have twelve townships in all to explore. The land gone over by them in White Earth is heavily timbered with pine and a small mixture of other woods but where they are in Red Lake, the country is admirably adapted to the purposes of agriculture. It is mixed prairie and brush land and it can all be brought under cultivation with comparitively little difficulty, The townships mentioned lay between the Clearwater and Lost Rivers, this side of Red Lake, and Mr. Rhinehart states that it is as fine a country as any in the northwest, which is saying a great deal. A large number of intending settlers already have their eyes upon that section and we may expect a rush there which will be a small edition of the settlement of Oklahoma, when the lands are open to settlement.

The results of reciprocity have only begun to show themselves. The ink is hardly dry yet on some of the reciprocity treaties, But in nine months of reciprocity with Brazil our exports to that nation have increased 13 percent or $1,483,576, in four months reciprocity with Cuba, ending December 31, the exports of the United States to that fertile island have increased $2,247,576; and in the single month of January 1892, the increase in the exports of American flour to Cuba was more than 700 per cent. The exports to Porto Rico for four months show an increase of over 80 percent, By the rebiprocal trade arrangements already more than 17,000,000 Latin Americans are enabled to buy American products at very much lower prices. Reciprocity in non-competing products with Germany and other European nations will also go on record as an achievement of the present Republican administration.

In making reciprocity the complement of protection the republican party has been true to its principles of legislating for the greatest good to the greatest number. Not one jot or tittle of protection to our domestic industries has been sacrificed. The home market for the products of our farmers and manufacturers has been increased in a very marked degree, This is an achievement which the people will show by their votes that they appreciate.—Grand Forks Herald.

THE MASTER OF THE HOUSE.

He cannot walk, he cannot speak,
Nothing he knows of books or men;
He is the weakest of the weak
And has not strength to hold a pen.

He has no pocket and no purse,
Nor ever yet has owned a penny;
But has more riches than his nurse,
Because he wants not any.

He rules his parents by a cry,
And holds them captive by a smile;
A despot strong through infancy,
A king from lack of guile.

He lies upon his back and crows,
Or looks with grave eyes on his mother;
What can he mean? But I suppose
They understand each other.

Indoors and out, early and late,
There is no limit to his sway;
For, wrapt in baby robes of state,
He governs night and day.

Kisses he takes as rightful due,
And, Turklike, has his slaves to dress him;
His subjects bend before him, too;
I'm one of them, God bless him.

ARBUTUS BERRIES.

ARBUTUS berries, when they are ripening from orange to flame color, and anon from flame color to a glorious crimson, are pretty to look upon; and a clustering spray of blossom leaf and fruit forms a charming ornament for a lady's hair. So at least thought Captain Mark Brett, thought he was a man not given to thinking about such things.

Mark had been spending a good deal of time in this garden of late. His quarters were hard by that is to say, within a ride—and Mrs. Carrington's lodge gates had opened to him and closed behind him oftener than any one cared to count since his battery had been sent to the fort on the hill a year before.

Now he stood still and looked around. Every one else had gone within doors, and he, too, was going directly. He was engaged to dine with the Carringtons, mother and daughter, and there was going to be something of a dinner-party, but his dress clothes were being already laid out in the little room over the porch, which had become in a manner his own on these occasions, and he was never long over his toilet. He could afford a few minutes to stand still and think.

There was the house—a cozy, ample, comfortable house. With his eyes he took in the deep-thatched roof and the stacks of smoking chimneys, which had an air of joyous preparation in the cold departing light. There were the stables. With his ear he noted the cherry sound of ringing hoofs and busy voices, giving token of brisk prosperity and abundance. On every side were trim hedge and shaven turf, while from the flower gardens gleaming panes showed where the rows of greenhouses and vineries had caught the last rays of the sinking sun.

"How jolly, how awfully jolly it all is!" murmured Mark to himself.

In point of fact, Captain Brett's "all" was at the identical moment peeping from behind the above-mentioned lattice, watching his antics as closely as the waning light permitted her to do. She had thought—no matter what she had thought—just before dressing time.

What if she had been out with Mark, strolling hither and thither in the dark? Nobody had objected. Her mother was Mark's best friend.

"And the poor old lady wants somebody here to look after things most awfully," Mark now proceeded to ponder. "She is too rich to be easy in her mind in this big house at nights, with nobody but servants. I would be the very one for her. I would look after everything. And I would be as good to her as possible—for she is uncommonly kind to me, and I am as fond of her as I can be. We should hit it off together first-rate. As for Edith;" he paused. "As for Edith;" another pause "If only people would not think I am after Edith's money!" he said, slowly.

He was well aware that this was just what people would think—what many people were indeed already thinking.

He was a poor man and Edith Carrington was an only child.

Edith was a cherry, little, plain girl, with pleasant ways and an active, energetic mind. For some time after she and Mark had become acquainted no thought of the heiress as a possible sweetheart or wife had ever entered the old soldier's mind.

He had begun by trotting over to The Hatch once a week or so, because country neighbors were rare in the part where she was quartered, and because he was a sociable man, and liked a welcome chat and change from the monotony of barrack life. This was in the springtime of the year.

Then came autumn and the shortening of the daylight. By that time Mark had begun to look jealously at any third person who might be a guest beneath the thatched roof, which had become to him a loadstar, and toward which his thoughts were continually straying, in whatsoever direction his feet might be turned. If the guest chanced to be a young man —and relatives of this kind were forever turning up at The Hatch—Captain Brett would retire within himself, be taciturn, and watchful and uncommunicative.

To-night, however, as he mused all alone in the dusk outside of the swiftly lighting rows of windows he felt that his time had come; he must do something, make some effort to find out how the land lay at once within the next few hours. He could go on no longer as he was living. A young fellow, one of Edith's innumerable cousins—confound these cousins—was to arrive the very next day, and a dozen others were to follow for the Christmas week. He must be beforehand with them. Yet how to go straight at the terrible question, yea or nay?

Then he looked up and looked again at the arbutus tree, and a happy thought inspired his breast.

"What in the world is he doing?" wondered Edith from her window. She herself was all in a bustle to be dressed and down before the other people arrived—neigobors were occasionally unpunctual, especially if they had far to drive on a dark night, and it seemed to her that if Mark would be equally sharp they might have a nice little quarter of an hour or so all by themselves in the lamp-lit drawing-room presently.

Mark had more than once seemed to appreciate such a quarter of an hour.

He was gathering sprays of arbutus laden with berries and blossoms.

A few minutes after and Marie, the maid, appeared, bearing the same at her young mistress's door. "From M. le Captaine," observed the abigail, arily (for messieurs les captaines there is always a soft spot in a French girl's fancy), "for the hair of mademoiselle. He begs that mademoiselle will do him the honer to wear the posie," eyeing the massive bunch with the disgust of an artist; "it is too large; it is too heavie for the hair, this great bush.

"But I contrive, I arrange, but it need not that I use it all," more cheerfully.

"Permettezmoi, mademoiselle; one leetle piece will do all that is required. Mademoiselle will, of course, wear what monsieur has sent?" demurely, as with an afterthought.

Mademoiselle bowed her head.

. . . .

The same evening a year later.

"I never could make it out," observed Charlie Hooper, the gossip of the fort, to a select circle of listeners. "I was altogether out in my reckonings in that quarter. I thought old Mark had dropped into a good thing, and knew it. By Jove, though Edith Carrington is no beauty, she is a very nice girl; and old Mark is not everybody's bargain himself, by Jove. We all thought it was a done thing.

"Mark went for her like blazes. He was never away from The Hatch. The widow seemed agreeable, and the girl, I hear, has broken her heart since it all came to nothing. What stopped it no one knows. Poof! In the twinkling of an eye it bust up. Mark was off; the Carringtons held their tongues, and not a soul could find out the rights of the story."

"I'll find out, however," decided one of the group, as the prattler ceased; and presently the person who thus meditated slipped away from the rest, and he and Mark Brett were seen strolling off across the fields away from the fort.

Afternoon was giving place to evening; it was almost the same witching hour as that in which we first beheld Edith Carrington's lover.

"Hold hard!" exclaimed Captain Brett's companion. "Look out, there! How dark it grows! You almost ran me into that arbutus tree."

"Arbutus tree?" That's not an arbutus tree," said Mark gruffly. "Don't you know an arbutus tree when you see it?"

"Rather. And when I don't see it. In darkness or in light, this is an arbutus."

"Rot! It is nothing of the kind. It—now don't bother, for I tell you it is not," continued Brett, sharpness of accent increasing as memory woke more and more, "And I ought to know. Confound you, then, if you will have it, I tell you all my happiness in the world once turned upon an arbutus tree. Yes, it did; you may stare if you please; I know what I am talking about; I—I—it—but for it—never mind it—I'm a fool, if you like, only don't tell me that I don't know arbutus berries again when I see them."

"Arbutus berries? Oh, well, we all know the berries. There are none, as it happens, on this tree," said the younger man, peering about. "However, if you only knew an arbutus by its berries," laughing with his nose in the air.

"Perhaps I might not know the tree for certain without them," conceded Mark, reluctantly. "Neither would you. One shrub is very like another."

"But there are the blossoms."

"Blossoms?"

Now that noodle of a Mark had never observed that the arbutus has such a thing as a blossom. He was not a gardener, and the only time he had ever noticed the shrub at all had been in the waning December dusk, when the wealth of crimson fruit had caught his eye. The hanging blossoms, which as every one knows, or ought to know, come out at the same time as the berries ripen, had been entirely overlooked by him.

In a few moments the veil had fallen from his eyes; he saw it all; the mistake into which ignorance had led him; the pitfall into which diffidence had entrapped him.

Of course, Edith—his Edith, that should have been—had worn a spray of green, with white bells pendant therefrom, on the fateful evening when he had fancied her lost to him forever.

One glance had doomed him in his own eyes. He had not seen his arbutus berries wreathed in the dark locks for which he had designed them, and he had sat thereafter with dumb lips and a dead weight on his heart—and then, then had followed the maidenly modesty which he had mistaken for resentment, the reticence which had prevented explanation, his own proud resolve to make neither complaint nor comment, and finally his retirement in full marching order from the scene. He had told himself that he was a man who knew when he was beaten.

As he had ridden away that night he had mentally bidden farewell to all the bright prospects which had danced before his eyes during the past months; had told himself he had been deluded and mistaken; and quietly set about to retrace his steps.

So well had he trusted them that he had baffled even his comrades in arms, and it was only now, only when a kindly lad had the luck to stumble upon the keynote of the affair at the outset, pressed home query upon query that he was prevailed upon to disclose the events of the past.

. . . .

"I never did understand it," murmured the joyful Edith in her lover's ear a few hours later, "and never mind what I supposed. I wore the arbutus exactly as I received it; it came from you; only Marie would put in only half, and there were no berries—of that I am absolutely sure."

"So am I," said Brett.

"For I recollect hearing her mutter to herself something about 'great ugly, red fruits,' which made me suspect she did not admire your taste, and was devoutly thankful you had confined yourself to the arbutus blossom."

"I tell you what," cried Mark, starting to his feet, "I see it all now. Oh, heavens! that I should have been such an idiot! That fiend of a woman had picked off the berries and thrown them away."

Which was exactly what Marie had done.

Now, did ever a man run greater risk of shipwreck from a little want of common sense, and a complete ignorance of horticulture?—Exchange.

VALUABLE SUGGESTIONS ABOUT FARM WORK.

How to Make an Asparagus Bed—Plowing Experiments—Feeding Straw to Cattle—Other Valuable Information.

How to Make an Asparagus Bed.

What a time used to be made over the preparation of an asparagus bed, to be sure! Deep and laborious trenching and cartloads of manure, involving a great amount of heavy toil and large expense, were deemed essential to success in raising the succulent vegetable. But most of this was entirely unnecessary, results as satisfactory being obtained at a little of the expense and very much less labor.

It is true, however, that the land for an asparagus bed cannot be too rich. It must also be free from stagnant water, dry and warm. If at all inclined to be wet, it should be tile-drained—in fact, it would be well to underdrain in any case.

If it is desired to have an asparagus bed quickly, plants should be purchased, not more than a year old, if they can be obtained, as vigorous, well-grown plants of that age are as good as those of two years' growth, and less apt to be stunted.

But those who have an asparagus bed already growing, and want to plant another, can afford to wait a year and raise plants of their own. Asparagus seed should be sown in rich, mellow earth early in the spring, in rows about fifteen inches apart. They should be an inch apart in the rows, and covered about an inch deep.

The first season's care consists simply in keeping the soil mellow and free from weeds. The following spring the plants should be set out in the permanent bed prepared for them.

It is some trouble, of course, to raise one's own plants, and causes the delay of a year if one has not a bed already. But it is the best way, provided proper care is taken of them, to get plants, because they will usually be better than those obtained in the market; and besides they can remain undisturbed in their original bed until the time arrives for transplanting.

One of the most important points to be observed in setting out the plants is to give them plenty of elbow room. They will give better crops and provide them earlier in the season than if closely crowded. As these suggestions are for farmers, with whom saving of space is of less consequence than saving of time and labor, we would advise making the rows not less than four feet apart and setting the plants two and a half to three feet apart in the rows, so as to admit of cultivation with a horse hoe both ways. With so much space in which to grow, the roots, if strong at the beginning, will make a vigorous growth.

It is not now considered essential, nor, indeed, advisable, to set the plants as deep as was formerly recommended. Three or four inches is deep enough. Mark off the rows at the distance indicated above with a common corn marker, and set the plants where the lines cross, carefully spreading out the roots and "firming" the soil above them. As the plants are to remain a long time, it is worth while to do the job thoroughly and well.

Asparagus is a wholesome and agreeable vegetable, and every farm should have a bed of it for home consumption. But, grown in the practical way above described, it may be made a source of considerable profit; for large, tender asparagus shoots command a good price in the market. The best quality is always sure of a quick sale at a handsome figure.

Plowing Experiments.

This is one of the practical questions which must be determined by each farmer for himself, or by one enterprising farmer for his neighborhood, when the same conditions exist over the same locality.

One farmer, whose experience we noted some years ago, seemed to throw absolute discredit on the theory that deep plowing is best, especially in a dry season. He prepared half an acre with great care, manuring heavily and subsoiling to the depth of sixteen inches. After harrowing thoroughly, he thought the tract was in the best possible shape for giving a fine crop. Another contiguous half-acre, which he had not time to prepare in the same way, was equally well manured, but plowed only two inches deep and given an extra harrowing.

Both tracts were planted to corn, which came up well, and for the first month there was no apparent difference between them. Then a severe drought began, and by the close of July the shallow-plowed part was far ahead of the other. August was dry, and at the end of the month the deeply-plowed tract was suffering badly, the leaves becoming yellow nearly up to the ears, while the other half acre suffered but little. It grew rapidly, and made the best crop of corn on the place or in the neighborhood.

The surface soil in this case was a light loam, quite rolling with a yellow clay sub-soil thirty feet deep, jointed and well adapted for draining.

On the other hand, an Illinois farmer gives it as his experience that deep plowing is the condition of success with him. A neighbor who plows not deeper than three and a half or four inches for corn, gets from ten to thirty bushels per acre, on land of the same quality as his own. He, on the contrary, plows from six to seven and a half inches, and realizes from fifty-three or four to over sixty bushels to the acre.

These illustrations show the necessity of careful experimenting on the part of every farmer to determine for himself such questions of method. He cannot depend upon the conclusions of some experiment station a hundred or a thousand miles away, as we have frequently pointed out, although we must not be understood as disparaging in any degree the work of those generally useful institutions.

The farmer who goes on, year after year, working his land in the same rut, and resting satisfied with an average of eighteen or twenty bushels of corn per acre, when, by a change of method, he can, with little, if any, additional labor or expense, secure fifty or sixty bushels, is doing a very foolish thing, because, if he only wants so much corn, he can get it from a smaller area, and with actually less labor than by old-fashioned methods.

As a rule, we believe that deep plowing will yield the best results, year in and year out, especially when combined with a thorough system of under-draining. Such exceptions as the one above noted serve mainly to "prove the rule." But let every farmer test the matter for himself, and thus determine whether his soil is one of the exceptions.

Feeding Straw to Cattle.

The philosophers tell us that a good sized cow must eat 140 pounds of straw a day to support life and as a cow cannot chew up and ruminate this amount of straw it is easily seen why cows are always in such thin flesh when compelled to live on a straw stack. Indeed it is about as much as cows can do to retain their flesh in cold weather on a feed of all the first-class hay they can eat. This, however, is not saying that straw has not its uses in feeding. The feeding value of straw will depend upon the kind of straw and the condition in which it was cut. We never thought much of oat or rye straw for feeding purposes but wheat and barley straw make an excellent ration when cut short say in inch lengths made wet and mixed with corn meal and bran. This of course is the ration for cows in milk, and straw in such a ration is just about as good as ordinary hay, especially the straw of barley that has to be cut green to prevent the grain from shattering out. If it was not for the barbs on this straw that make it disagreeable to handle and sometimes dangerous to the eyes of the cows, we would just as lief have it as the ordinary quality of hay.

Success Depends Upon Little Things.

Success in honey producing always depends on an infinite number of little successes. If we can imagine that our apiary of 100 colonies represents a great factory of 100 hands, every one of them being perfectly drilled and equipped, and capable of performing a certain amount of work, we can see how it is when one to three or more colonies become demoralized, right at the beginning of a honey-flow. The aggregate business suffers in proportion to the small failures. If we prepare an apiary of 100 colonies of the best strain for the honey harvest, we will have to manage them with more than ordinary skill; if more than 15 per cent of them do not waste their time and opportunities, sulking in great clusters on the front of the hive, or by indulging in excessive swarming, or refusing to stay anywhere long enough to settle down to business. Perhaps no apiary can be managed at times so effectually as to wholly prevent loss from the causes I have named, but by the proper knowledge of the nature and habits of bees, this loss can be reduced.—G. H. Kirkpatrick, in the Indiana Farmer.

Dairying in Denmark.

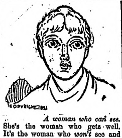
Is it true that the Danes have trebled the yield of milk in that country in three years with the same number of cows. To be modest in our assertions, we simply do not believe it. They have, however, done wonders in this direction, but that is not saying that they have performed miracles, which they would be doing to treble the yield in three years with the same cows. How low down they were in the scale when they began to improve we have no means of knowing, but to make an increase of one hundred per cent. annually for three years is simply impossible. The fact probably is that while there has been a considerable increase in the amount of butter made, it probably has not been more than a third or a half more than originally, but the quality has been improved so as to make it sell for perhaps three times what it originally did. What the "three times" figures really mean, in all probabilities, is that Denmark now exports three times as much butter in value as it did three years ago, or just before the improvement began. The whole world is indebted to that little country for the light she helped to throw upon the science of butter making.—American Dairyman.

About Salting Butter.

Salting butter in the churn is one of the unsolved problems. Lots of people say they do it and tell how they do it but others say they can not do it that way and get enough salt into the butter to suit customers. It is generally conceded that salting in the churn is always very light salting, from one-fourth to a half ounce of salt to the pound of butter even though an ounce and a half is put in at the start. Then again how about the second working? Do you do it or not and if not how do you keep the butter from becoming mottled? These are the points that trouble those who succeed to their own satisfaction. Some people do succeed to their own satisfaction but not to the satisfaction of others. So far, for instance, as the amount of salt that can be got into granular butter the limit seems to be one-half ounce, as that is all the brine will hold that is depended upon for carrying the salt. That amount is not always enough.

A Practical Suggestion.

A correspondent to Practical Farmer says: Few farmers know that a fine crop of rutabagas can be grown on the potatoe patch. The old way is to sow strap leaf turnips; but I think one bushel of rutabagas worth four of turnips. On a half acre of potatoe ground, after last hoeing, I sowed two ounces seed of Purple Top Swede, and when digging the potatoes, I was careful to hoe the dirt out around the roots. It did not take four hours longer in digging the half acre. I have taken from the patch 100 bushels of fine potatoes, and 75 bushels rutabagas. This is better than raising a lot of watery turnips.



A woman who can see. She's the woman who gets well. It's the woman who won't see and won't believe who has to suffer.

And it's needless. There's a medicine—a legitimate medicine—that's made to stop woman's suffering and cure woman's ailments. It's Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It's purely vegetable and perfectly harmless—a powerful general, as well as uterine, tonic and nervine, imparting vigor and strength to the whole system. For periodical pains, weak back, bearing-down sensations, nervous prostration, and all "female complaints," it's a positive remedy. It improves digestion, enriches the blood, dispels aches and pains, melancholy and nervousness, brings refreshing sleep, and restores health and strength.

No other medicine for women is guaranteed, as this is. If it fails to give satisfaction, in any case, the money paid for it is refunded. You pay only for the good you get. On these terms it's the cheapest.

But more than that, it's the best.

Bad taste in the mouth or an unpleasant breath, when resulting from Catarrh, are overcome, and the nasal passages which have been closed for years, are made free by the use of Ely's Cream Balm. I suffered from catarrh for twelve years, experiencing the nauseating dropping in the throat peculiar to that disease, and nose bleed almost daily. I tried various remedies without benefit until last April, when I saw Ely's Cream Balm advertised. A Smelling Contest.

One of the new games is the smelling contest. From eight to a dozen different bottles, filled with odoriferous liquids, are prepared by a druggist and then numbered. Then each person who enters the contest is given a card with corresponding numbers printed thereon. The contestant takes a whiff at each bottle and writes down the name of the contents. The one naming the most of them correctly gets the prize. There is said to be an immense amount of fun connected with the game, as it is more difficult than one imagines to correctly name even well-known liquids of strong odor by the sense of smell, as after trying three or four bottles confusion generally follows.—Philadelphia Record.

The Light of Other Days.

The day when man first discovered how to supply himself with artificial light must be very far back, but many generations went by before he had anything better than torches for out-door use, and for in-door conveniences a wick floating loosely in a vessel of oil. Gas as an illuminant is not old, the electric light is the invention of yesterday, while there are thousands of people not yet three score and ten, whose youthful lessons were learned by the feeble gleam of a tallow candle. In the country households, the manufacture of a weekly or monthly supply of candles came as regularly as wash day. The soldiers of the late war remember "star" candles very well, but doubtless few can tell whence the name. The discoverer of a process to separate glycerine and fatty matters from stearic acid in the making of candles was the Frenchman DeMille, whose factory at Paris was located at the "Barriere de l'Etoile—"barrier (or gate) of the star," and from this circumstance his manufactures were known as "star candles." The days of such illuminators are gone, and the luxurious cars of our modern railroads are lighted by gas or electricity. To many eyes, however, the electric glare is unpleasant, but all are satisfied with the soft yet brilliant illumination of "The Burlington's" vestibuled train by the Frost Dry Carburetor System. A Bundle of Wires.

Nervous people are often likened to a bundle of wires so sensitive are they to the least outside vibration. The brain and stomach are connected with a great sympathetic chord or nerve, and trouble in the stomach is reflected by the organs of thought. Invigoration is the proper means of overcoming nervousness. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the finest tonic in existence and a thorough remedy for constipation, billiousness, malaria and other ailments.
